"I Guess it Must Be the Flag of my Disposition"

I cannot explain to a fourteen-year-old child becoming man, dear to me, why I wear my hair so long.

I cannot tell him
as I tell my older friends, Your hair is this long too, why do you keep it coiled in your head?

He thinks I must have grown it out in my righteous years of rebellion, and somehow forgotten to outgrow it.

I could tell him how I fought the clippers in my mother's hand with tears and wriggling, years before I turned fourteen—

But I am almost thirty.
I can only tell him how I love the luxury of it, the tumble of a living wind around my shoulders.

I cannot tell him
as I tell my reasonable elders, This is the banner of who I am, a testimony truer than the name you gave me!

He can't see in my eyes how I love to watch the grasses of Kansas escaping their fences under the wind.
He has lived too long in Kansas.

I could tell him that cutting it would cut my breath, as cruel and as ineffectual as year after year to cut the grass of Kansas.

But I may cut it someday.
I can only tell him that it grows not from the scalp but from some deep stratum of the living soil.

Its length is evidence of my living!

The clippers would only make it spring out faster, I would have to cut it again and again—

It will be the last of me to cease.

INTRODUCTION: The Rainbow Family Gatherings

When I graduated from college in 1978 with no better plan in my head than to hitchhike around the country, I thought I was a remnant of something all but extinct. Just about all the other long-haired freshmen who'd arrived at Beloit College four years before had cut off their ponytails by senior year, no doubt thinking about job interviews and careers.

It didn't take many miles of thumbing for me to give up expecting a ride every time I saw a Volkswagen van full of longhairs coming my way. In fact, most of the folks who stopped for me were short-haired and rednecked, regular folks, working people. This I took as another sign that the hippie heyday of the Sixties was history, and I had missed it. But it was on one of my journeys out west that I first heard the rumor of the Rainbow Gathering.

In 1981 my sister Emily, who had transferred to a school out on the West Coast, mailed me a copy of an invitation printed in a rainbow of color. So that summer I hitchhiked west from my home in rural Georgia all the way to the backwoods of Washington state, surfing a wave of human kindness across the country in my accustomed manner. There I discovered that Haight-Ashbury and the Summer of Love hadn't vanished into the past; they had only retreated to the wilderness of the National Forests.

At the 10th annual Rainbow Family Gathering of the Tribes, high in the mountains and deep in the woods, I found a city of longhairs living in tents and cooking communally under tarps, twelve thousand strong. I was awestricken, dumbfounded, thunderstruck, mind-boggled and blown away.

"Welcome Home!" went the greeting I heard everywhere as I wandered the trails and meadows. I didn't need the hint. I knew immediately that I was Home. A majestic circle of tipis, a myriad of kitchens serving vegetarian food, drum circles and acoustic jams around campfire after campfire, a free clinic for alternative healing, group yoga and meditation practice, outdoor theater, a barter circle, fire-twirling jugglers, Kid Village, Hug Patrol and other amazements surrounded me like a 24/7, 360-degree hallucination.

Again and again, casual hellos would turn into long, intense conversations with strangers who serendipitously crossed my path. Everything was free, courtesy of donations to the "Magic Hat." I watched a fierce contention between outraged parents and advocates of erotic massage resolve itself over two hours of heartfelt listening, facilitated by the mere passing of a feather. I attended a workshop on riding freight trains. Most amazing of all, the central focus of the Gathering turned out to be a gigantic silent circle for World Peace on the Fourth of July, followed by a children's parade, feasting and celebration.

Though I didn't realize it then, hundreds of dedicated volunteers were working day and night to maintain peace and security and keep everyone healthy, hydrated and fed. Another hard-working crew stayed afterward to clean up and restore the gathering site.

According to legend, the Gatherings had been sparked in 1970 by the meeting of flower-power peaceniks and combat veterans fresh from the jungles of Vietnam. The hippies had a vision of neo-tribal utopia in the Cathedral of Nature. They had grown weary of demonstrating against the evils of the world as it was, and wanted to demonstrate instead how the world could be. The vets had the practical know-how to make it happen: field kitchens, field latrines, field hospitals. And perhaps more starkly than anyone, they understood the need for peace, love, and healing in a troubled country and a violent world.

From that unlikely convergence sprang a full-fledged "Gathering of the Tribes," a phrase previously used on posters for 1967's Human Be-In at Golden Gate Park. Everyone with a bellybutton was invited. From bikers to fairies, hobos to anarchists, Yippies to Deadheads, Jesus freaks to Hare Krishnas, every faction of the Baby Boom rebellion came together in a true "peaceable assembly"—a phrase previously used in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The Gathering blossoms in a different National Forest each July, following the consensus of the Vision Council on July 7th of the previous year. Regional gatherings spring up behind it wherever it goes. An annual "World Gathering" now follows a similar trajectory, and has likewise spawned new gatherings and tribal families in country after country around the globe.

On my last day in Washington, as I was hitching a ride out, I met a brother from my adopted homeland down South. He took a break from sorting piles of trash and recycling to draw me a map to a regional gathering in North Carolina the following month. There I met the Rainbow tribe of my home region, the Southern Appalachians—reclaimed under the Cherokee name Katuah—and discovered Home all over again. From that point on I never missed either the annual Gathering of the Tribes or the Katuah regional gatherings if I could possibly help it.

It took me a few Gatherings to get past that initial stage of blissful awe to see that the deeper joy of gathering comes from pitching in to help manifest the miracle. Each day I tried to do my share of the daily work, taking a turn at hauling supplies, gathering and cutting firewood, chopping veggies, washing pots, sorting trash, digging a latrine (a.k.a. “shitter”). I attended councils and learned the art of leaderless decision-making by consensus. And from every Gathering of the Tribes I attended, I brought home at least one Gathering-inspired poem, which I would share around the campfires of subsequent gatherings.

In 1990, I traded in my nomadic life and settled in Atlanta with a lady I’d met at a Katuah regional and married at the same gathering the following year. Since then, balancing work and marital responsibilities, I haven’t been able to make every annual Gathering. But I’ve remained active with the Katuah Tribe and have never missed a Summer Solstice with my tribal community.

Over their near half-century of “hipstory,” the Gatherings have inevitably changed. They have grown more diverse, embracing new generations of alternative culture. Long hair is no longer the norm. New traditions have emerged and old ones have dwindled away. Aging gatherers stop coming, beloved elders pass on, children are born and welcomed into the Family, and “youngsters” who grew up coming to Gatherings rebel against stale tradition in the time-honored way.

Some of the changes have been the natural result of evolution within the tribe. Others were imposed from outside. The U.S. Forest Service has sometimes cooperated with the Family to help keep the Gatherings safe and environmentally benign. At other times it has attempted to shut down the Gatherings using a variety of legal (and illegal) tactics.

In the mid-1980s and early ‘90s, the agency wrote new regulations requiring one or more individuals to sign a “permit” on behalf of everyone present at a Gathering. Despite the First Amendment’s clear guarantee of the rights of Association and Assembly, longtime gatherers were targeted for refusing to sign, and several served six-month prison terms. After a successful lawsuit exposed the obvious absurdity of signing a legal document on behalf of thousands of others without their consent, the U.S.F.S. backed off the permit demand. But the Gatherings still endure various levels of official harassment from year to year.

Rainbow is a visionary experiment in creating a new society, but it is also the raw material of that experiment, a microcosm of society as it is. Inflated egos, social conditioning, drugs and alcohol, race and gender, political divisions, and superficial distraction are all packed in the baggage we bring to the woods. The bullying tactics of the authorities have driven away some of the gentler gatherers whose primary focus was spirituality or children, disturbing the balance between those seeking the vision and those just looking for a party.

But every year more bright and cheerful young people find their way Home and add their own utopian visions to the veggie stew. And many old-timers who have invested their whole lives in the Gatherings keep coming, living the vision summer after summer. I honor and respect them not as leaders or “chiefs,” which the Rainbow tribe neither has nor needs, but as personal elders in my own life journey.

Life at the Gatherings gave me a useful post-graduate education that played a central role in forming my character. My sense of family as “everyone with a bellybutton” helps me to see past differences in the diverse and eclectic community of Atlanta. The sense of responsibility for the needs of others that I brought back from the woods is part of my work ethic wherever I am employed.

Because of the high carbon impact of air travel, these days I attend the annual Gathering only when it’s close enough to drive. But the Gatherings will always be part of me, and the Rainbow vision of an all-inclusive human family is still my spiritual center. For that reason, I re-gard the poems collected here—aside from the first few, written early in my evolution as a poet—as some of my best. I hope publishing them as a Giveaway will help future gatherers remember the vision that gave birth to the Gatherings and hold the balance for the generations to come.

To honor the noncommercial essence of the Rainbow, these poems can never be sold. That is why this volume has no cover price. If you share the vision, I invite you to pass my gift on to others by making a donation toward the next printing. I promise that this money will be held for that purpose as a sacred trust. I am deeply grateful to all who have donated to make my long-time dream a reality. Peace, love and healing to you all.

Thanks and blessings! Wing

Peace Prayer

10th Rainbow Family Gathering
Colville National Forest, Washington, 1981

“Hath Zeus no eye (who saith it?) watching his progeny?”
Ezra Pound

Lord, what a lovely thing! this ring of godly spirits gathered here in all our human colors, hands joined in homage to the high noon sun, hearts joining in a silence not of mourning but of strength:
listen, Lord,
a prayer for peace!

And the baby whose papa holds her high in our circle, she voices our silent cry until gradually—growing—someone hums the reply

We sing skyward one huge clear celestial sphere of sound, human harmonies joined across the meadow's light, filled with the warmth of human breath but breathless,

as if immortal angels sang one deathless everchanging note:

bright mantra drifting to the high source and center where the circle broken into rainbows in the bubble's sheer soap skin reflects again God's holy first-created pure white light—

Only in the Light will all the nations and races ever be one people, indivisible under God as we beneath this perfect sun, circled in these most high mountains, circling this sacred meadow stand to fill this pure air with our pure wordless prayer, lift this round silence to perfect circular sound:

listen, nations and races, a prayer of peace!

Somewhere Under a Raincloud

Boise National Forest, Idaho, 1982

The Gathering is gathering:
the brothers are leavening the bread, the sisters are harvesting the rice, the lovers of Earth are climbing the hill where Heaven descends in its robes of rainclouds to cleanse us and our ancient Mother turns to mud.

The firmament is opening, the moon is scattering the clouds, rising round and full of fire, a mirror for the day beyond our dark— this shadow of the turning Earth— and now the shadow falls across the full moon, Sun and Earth and Moon align as if they gather with us, and the stars are mirroring the fires of our camp.

The encampment is waking to the naked beauty of the day, the Sun bursts newborn from a cleft in the Earth, and the children are dancing, likewise naked, likewise newborn on the Mother's breast—She wears the raindrops like a diadem on every needle of her fine green mantle; He wears them in a bow of colors round his brow.

The mud has dried beneath our tires and our highways lead everywhere from this dirt road down: and descending, every citizen of this nation on a hill sees climbing from the valley a seven-colored rainbow's arch.
We pass beneath the arm of Heaven's benediction, breathing out the breath of the mountain, scattering the seed of silence and light.

Watersmeet

Ottawa National Forest, Michigan, 1983

Where the waters meet and leaping trout cross the road, where the double yellow line ends I saw a rainbow leaning on a pine tree outside some shop and knew I was almost Home.

Where a city had lived and vanished into pits and pockmarks full of rusted metal in the grass, where broken barrel-hoops marked the scattering of an ancient population, near a graveyard without ghosts we gathered.

Where we gathered a city rose from the grass, we trampled highways where our bare feet found old paths, we built a nation every morning on the coals of last night's campfire and cooked everybody breakfast.

Rainbow Mantras

Modoc National Forest, California, 1984

"The spirit host is advancing, they say.
They are coming with the buffalo, they say.
They are coming with the new earth, they say," sang the Ghost Dancers

Sometimes the world grows barren as a road:

ROCK OF AGES MONUMENTS
Authorized Dealer
(Chicago)

narrow as the highway between two cities—

FORTRESS CHURCH SUPPLY
Help Wanted
(Denver)

but I've arrived and the sky-blue schoolbus that passed me once (Wyoming) and once again (Nevada) balloons like a sounding whale above a field of cars

"The blue bus is calling us . . .
Driver, where you taking us?" sang a California shaman

(California plate in parking lot: UZR WNGS)

A crowd of people all in natural step Two riders following on a white and a brown horse Three or four vehicles idling behind, and the dust coming to life last of all—

Bless us, I think we are beginning to arrive.

"Oh, city of gypsies, who could see you and forget?" Lorca sang

We are the pale ghosts of Indians browning in the sun here on this ridge the Pit River people hold sacred.

We come every year to a place this close beneath the sun to brown our skins and grip more firmly the earth in our roots: natives of this clear sky, natives of the rain tomorrow, a nation under the Rainbow.

We feel darker ghosts around us, watching: for ten thousand years people have camped here with their children, their tents and cooking pots, gazing up at the same slow constellations, drumming and dancing to an identical fullness of the moon.
 Only the places they came from differed much from us, and how they came.

“Rainbows their raiment, aye, the winds for their steeds!” sang Li Po

I slept at dawn and woke late and somehow knew it was not too late

I put on the clothes of my sacred obsessions, the shaman's feathers, the clown's bright underwear—one red and one blue sock, my grandfather's pajama bottoms and beads from Mardi Gras—

Shouldered my drum and tucked my owl's tail from the highway shoulder into my headband (that felt funny so I took it down and carried it in my hand)

At the top of the ridge I came into the company of the silence: sat listening until my prayer came

I laid down my drum and took off all my precious things, left my special clothes in a heap of colors and wandered naked on the mountain

“Cover my earth mother four times with many flowers,” sang the Zuni

High in an ocean of small flowers the circle formed:
 so far across you only saw the colors.
 From hand to hand we passed each second of the silence.

To the north and east and south seven mountains held our breath and the snows of summer glinted.
 To the west
 at the treeline the conifers listened.

In the forest our metropolis of tents was quiet:
 from the ridge,
 from the sun in our faces and the scent of the sage, our chant spilled to flood the valleys.

A high chant even the children understood. Peace.
 And then the silent syllable that flowed from us reached our altitude:
 a long vowel from our fingertips touched and overflowed.

“The wind blows where it wills, and you hear the sound of it, but you do not know where it comes from or where it goes; so it is with every one who is born of the Spirit,”

sang the Avatar of this passing age

(After long wandering among the multitude of the naked I began to watch for my heap of colors, ready now not to find it. Finally of course I found it: looked up one more time and saw seven mountains all looking back at me precisely at eye level)

“We shall cover ourselves with the gold of owning nothing,” Vallejo sang

WELCOME TO THE WORLD PEACE BOOGIE

It's arrived!

People moving far off on a hill like dancers trailing scarves of dust

For a hundred miles around cows look up from their chewing and crowd to the highway fence, dogs forget the length of their chains and howl in arcane harmonies from farm to farm—

Occasions like this leave a trail behind them: the smoke of a stick of incense, the whirling trace of a juggler's firesticks

“We're dancing on the edge of the world,” the California natives sang

Harold the one-legged duck lost his leg at the '83 Gathering, tough karma, those Rainbow kids popped him loose of his rubber band sometime in the night, now there's a hole where he once trailed an orange plastic leg on wings spread to the horizons, and poor Harold doesn't hold air any more—

“Do not confine your children to your own learning, for they were born in another time,” a Hebrew proverb sings

Here on the mountain the air is freedom the earth is respect and nakedness is sacred

Down in the valleys we will breathe the cinder of highways, of cities we will walk in shoes over asphalt and cement

But always we carry our sacred nakedness in open palms, in faces that reflect the sun going down over Shasta from this high ridge in the memory

“Naked you came from Earth the Mother.
Naked you return to her.
May a good wind be your road,” sang the Omaha

Sometimes the world gets barren as a road:

WATCH FOR ROCKS
(They may attempt to communicate with you) narrow as a highway between cities—

HUMAN HEAD RENOVATIONS
Hair Creations
(San Francisco)

but I have seen a mountain blossom into a city of tents and I have seen a highway ramp refract a caravan of colors out of a line of climbing cars

“From the doorway of rainbow, the path out of which is the rainbow, the rainbow passed out with me,” sang the Navajo

We return to the four compass-points, to our gardens and farms in the cities and hills of this country and others, the old places across oceans where our migrations began: Jerusalem, Tokyo, London and Berlin—

“Let the names of imperial cities caress the ears with brief meaning,” Mandelstam sang

*Hairs grow on the body.
The open meadows fill with young trees.
Slow forests govern the earth.*

“Through the middle of broad fields, the rainbow returned with me.
To the center of my house,

to arrive.

Two Moons

Modoc National Forest, California, 1984

for Stefan, a traveler from Germany at his first Gathering

The seventh night.

Our circle is full.

These buses parked among the trees, the tipis above on a sagebrush plateau, sleeping tents for miles along the ridge: this campfire halfway down the road where crouching longhairs offer us coffee and ask for a cigarette.

My friend has one left, one:
it circulates, a spark among the stars.

“Tell me,” I asked him, hours ago, “do you feel part of something here?” (Earlier he’d traded his shirt for some trinket of mine in the trading circle, we tossed a frisbee where the council sat—) He thought a minute: shook his head.
 “Not really. Not yet.”
It was some time later that he noticed a second moon.

He pointed it out to me. “There.
You see? Just past the windshield of the bus.”

The rest of this last long night we’ve wandered lost between two moons, picking a dark path from campfire to campfire, crouching silent by the coals awhile—We crouch by this fire halfway down the road
a long time sometime after midnight.
 And wander on.

“Tell me,” I ask him, hours later, “when you passed around your only cigarette there by the fire, did you feel something then?
Something huge and asleep, sprawled for miles around you, something you belong to no matter where the morning carries you?”

He doesn’t answer for half an hour or so.
“Yes,” he says.

And the circle is full.

The Rainbow Warriors at Dawn

Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, 1985

I stepped through a sleeping camp of rainbow warriors at dawn, my brother and I going down to carry water from the spring.

They lay like other sleeping creatures inattentive in the early light, scattered in the leaves along our path traveling each through a forest of shadows toward morning.

We pass a second time, climbing back with our full buckets.

here and there a warrior sits attentive as the sun climbs and the valley opens:

dewdrops on the wildflower petals, mist rising from the circle below where the dancing has flattened down the grass.

At the Crystal Teahouse we find a sleepy gathering of warriors.
Some are early travelers.
Some have been up with us stoking the campfire with cigarettes and constellations all night, stirring rainbows out of sassafras and moon—

It's morning.
We start the tea.

Interdependence Day, 1985

Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, 1985

— Where were you when the jets went over?
(two Phantoms, 11:30 on the morning of the Fourth—)

— I was lifting a pick from the hard clay of Missouri, taking my turn at the slit trench of a shitter.
They came in across the treetops dragging their racket like a steel rake among our upturned faces.

I thought of the children.
Then remembered all the kids who know that sound and would already be running.

I drove the pick down hard, loosening earth for the brother standing ready with the shovel. My steel striking deep into roots, ringing stones—

The gashed air seemed to echo a long time between us.

— Muscle and bone. Muscle and bone.

When I stepped back sweating from the gouged earth and he stepped forward, smiling, I gripped my fear as if I gripped a weapon and smiled back at him. The echo still shrieking too loud in me to speak—

— *People will hurry here, grateful.
They will bend a moment and leave gifts for the forest.
Someone will come and cover the hole we dug with this same shovel. Roots will grow again where we cut them, ground cover will grow.
And children will not always run from Phantoms.*

We promised one another everything in a look.

Then he started shoveling. My sweat cooling in the shadow of the trees.

Commonwealth of Pennsylvania"

The old ones are with us

That boulder's been settin' there longer than any of us remembers, but it remembers longer, and the young ferns crowd close as any child born trusting in forever will

III. THE GATHERING OF LIGHTS

The five planets went retrograde and so the Family gathered in all the visible spectrum of our variety to be whole again

Our lost ones gathered with us from the Ultraviolet Fringe to the Outlaws of the Infrared and we were whole again

The moon was dead and not quite ready to be born again so we packed our flashlights and one by one came wandering into the circle of light-bearers to be whole again

The trees hold our guylines taut and kindly shade our tents and then at nightfall drop their nets of utter blackness over our pale searching beams

IV. THE COUNCIL OF DRUMS

First you carry the drum.
Follow the heart beating under your bare feet down the naked path and find your place among the drummers at the council fire.

Then the drum begins to carry you.
Close your eyes and leap with the sparks whirling up from the fire, ride the steady pulse of many hands releasing taut notes trapped in the skins of animals.

In the dark of the moon the circle of faces reflects the fire, each staring out of its private trance while the hands of the drummers travel on, a restless company of nomads walking homeward.

Stroke your own taut skin, feel the animal inside come alive again: rest until the dark lightyears quicken in your wrists, and strike the first round note in honor of an unborn moon.

The stars dance in the rising eddy of smoke and rhythm, an echo of the campfire's trance winking down from the ancient gathering of lights

V. THE GATHERING OF WATERS

Pennsylvania was a woman plumed with ferns, pendant with dew, uncomplaining under the feet of her children

arms of long afternoon reach golden from the sun, a gem set in the cleft of mountains as she lifts the day's gold-stitched hem over her face and stands goddess of twilight a while, and soon the night)

growing round in her spangled gown as the nights grew more brilliant and the moon's time approached until her bag of waters broke and flowed: bogwater, the moccasin-eater creekwater, talkative under the eaves of our tents rainwater, slick on our log bridges, puddling the tarpaulins springwater, a continual fountain from our plastic pipes into plastic jugs and bottles—

We stood in line to be water-bearers on the birthday of a new moon

a flute-player sits hidden in the waist-high reeds, the drummers glance up at the sound of laughter on the sky's taut skin and the rain god beams down)

All night the streams tell stories of the origin of circles as they meander our sleeping camp, and by morning the trails are a riddle in footprints

VI. THE CIRCLE OF AUNTS AND UNCLES

Stopped beside the trail to listen where the Sister Circle swayed and sang

A child stood watching the traffic of bare feet over the tender earth of the trail

Lingering there I saw the child venture down the fern bank to stand looking back and forth a moment before setting out sturdily southward

When I caught up I spotted underneath the muddy T-shirt that sure sign of a boy

The sister who came running down to retrieve him scolded only, “The Brothers’ Circle is too far, you have to stay with us”

The Sister Circle swayed and sang

I traveled on over the tender earth, remembering the northbound highway that brought me home once more to this swaying and singing of trees and wind, the circle of Aunts and Uncles

*Look, we have constructed an altar to the Mother of all the children!
Brothers and sisters, are not all these littler ones our nieces, our nephews?*

VII. UNDER THE PRISM OF VAPORS

Yes, we came by the highway of the empty cars flocking home to their barns before dark

We traveled the landscape of streetlights and signs under the electrical hallucinations of America

Over the dry slumber of the continent whose prophets have died preaching Rapture we came to put up our tents in a circle and call one place Home

A village springing up and vanishing under the eaves of the forest like mushrooms of the Millennium, the reunion of all Relations

We open and close our eyes these seven days and nights on the garden of Imagination, singing songs of the long Revolution, one more circling of earthlings under sun

And baptized in the mud of the Mother, bearing the dust of memories like a precious pollen, we depart on the four winds to carry on the practice of Rapture

We gather in ancient light, each moment's radiant envoy has traveled a straight line ninety million miles to rest here on the nakedness of children

VIII. FOUR CORNERS

Far across the farmland that was once a forest, across the rangeland that was all wild prairie, across mountains and desert the old women of the oldest race tend their breakfast fires and wait for the dawn of a day numbered on the calendars of a younger nation, marked for the quenching of these fires their grandmothers tended

The day breaks and they have not departed

Their grandsons are returning to them

Young women unknown to them touch the earth and pray with them this morning, eyes they do not see are looking south and west, wishing long life to their granddaughters' children

The grandmothers have not left the sacred mountain Spirits gather to applaud the sunrise Like tributaries on our way to the ancient gathering of waters, we wander and remain

IX. PROPHECY OF THE RAINBOW

Everything goes in a circle

There will always be another summer

Someday, Mother
 we will grow up and be grateful

Scout Council, April 1, 1987
Cherokee National Forest, Tennessee

A turtle peering out of its house is our welcome home, six feet from where we park the truck.

Then we see an aphid in the socket of one eye, peering in.

Dead turtle, greeting us on behalf of the continent that carries its name.

on the hillside of a perfect afternoon we meet to council over maps of the forest.

The place is beautiful, green for spring, the French Broad River high and hurrying against its banks, mountains shaped by some slow whimsy of the sky—

The continent is talking to us: children making up a new game, empty cans whose names the rain has washed away.

Drums at the Confluence of Visions

Nantahala National Forest, North Carolina, 1987

“This I burn as an offering.
Behold it!
A sacred praise I am making.
A sacred praise I am making.
My nation, behold it in kindness!”

Heyoka song, Dakota Sioux

Joined at birth like these small rivers that have slowly shaped the loins of the Mother, ceaselessly giving birth to the bigger stream, we choose our yearly confluence and come to live at least one week under our true names, in our light tents and transparent shelters, giving ceaselessly

Empowering the Council Feather

Great Spirit,

Divine Mother,
we know this feather came to us from you, we know its first purpose in the Creation is to fly—

Empower it so that each of us who takes it in turn may look down as the great eagle circling over our Council, empower us so that each may speak as the wind speaks from every corner of the Creation, looking down over the long shoulder of the horizon

Two insects I'd never seen before mating on my tent flap as I knelt to the zipper, moving in my granddaddy's old leather suitcase bulging with unborn works of art (watercolors and pastels and oils I embezzled from Art class at Central High a dozen years ago) my portfolio full of patient virgin paper

Like a little gearbox under some cosmic clutch, the kitchen crew relaxes to smoke and talk

Which is it that engages these gears, the work, or all this talk of life?

The Jehovah's Witnesses have joined us
—two brothers in shirtsleeves with briefcases, ties hanging parallel even as one (the elder) leans to the hand of a shaven Krishna devotee—
joined us, now we are complete

What rivulet of soft feet padded this ground bare, down the steep hill under low boughs?

(to the tent kitchen clearing where I rescue a cigarette package from the trash and turn it inside out, calling to the assembled—“Help! Emergency!
Anyone have a pencil or pen?”)

Small wings between my shoulder and the netting of my window stir a flutter in the long throat of the dusk-light, suddenly I am listening to the leafy thoughts of the forest

the Mother is walking on the land tonight, invisible except for the toe-marks the fieldmice leave, tiny tooth-glyphs in the dry corn, making it sacred

If you don't want to see it, make it go away.

(No, closing your eyes doesn't work.
I still see it.)

Remember to be joyful as you bend, somewhere surely this is sacrament

Look back and see your trampled Mother virgin once more

Remember to be humble as you walk on with your pocketful of pleasure

Look! Another one!
This one still burning!

(Any time I get homesick for this village of love and mud, I just start picking up the cigarette butts.)

Sister—you, walking away—
I think I understand you, even the first look belongs to me forever, a step impossible to draw back—see, I release you from our marriage of glances and you walk on—

The war of love requires courage, yes, how many of our brave warriors have returned bearing children on their backs?

“Send prayers to Asheville!” Under the gavel of the federal judge a peaceful camp looks up, uneasy at the sound of a light plane—

Almost time for our evening shower.

(Tell the drummers to pound that pulse of thunder deep into the ground, wake the stump the mill and wood-lathe left when they cut and turned and polished his lacquered hammer!)

Rain falls on the judge as on the judged.

“Send prayers to Asheville today, brothers and sisters—”

It's the angle of the hand to the skin, the stretch of the skin to the hole carved in the wood or fired in the clay, the angle of the hole to earth and mostly it's the shape of the air in the hole that makes the music of the drum

Sun, evening shadows, mist that drifts to rain:
 the food is ready and we join hands.
 It's only the clear day's light refracted through the wet nights that makes this Rainbow on the ground.

*Our circle makes a hole in the ground—spirit rising like water in a well, falling like the light on a pond, the round Earth and the rolling sky joined in a circular kiss . . .
 The Circle makes us Whole.*

Vision Council carries on all over camp—“Yeah, they're still talking—”

over a trading blanket, over buckets filling at the spring, over a rough sawhorse where two brothers draw the long saw between them—

No accident. We founded our village a year and a day ago precisely here (though it's been only a month since we found this place) at the confluence of visions

We are a village of visionaries and the Council carries on “—yeah, thirtysix hours now, and nobody seems to have a watch—” saxophone in the morning

Praise to the spirits of the four directions who join us here from such great distances!

sweet smell of sage drifting after someone on the trail

Praise to the Mother of mornings, you, pregnant dancer!

potatoes frying in the smoke of the cookfires, murmur of a village hidden in the leaves

Praise God for hunger and good food!

ritual of one more day between the haste of water and the reverie of the pines, each dawn since we lost track of the sabbath a fresh revelation

Ring All the Bells of Silence!

The silence of all but the poets and the children fell at midday like a stealthy dawn, a clown on tiptoe darting from kitchen to kitchen with a finger to the lips, awakening the camp (the poets irreverently scribbling)

The sunlight streamed down over us like an anointing as we assembled in our solitary vigils out of the thousand shadows of the woods into one, our hands found one another seeking the ancient figure they know (inspired circle, cipher of our common forgotten tongue, a prism for the daylight like the stillness of a huge bell, hushed)

Our listening lasted the arc of an hour across the meadow: then we each gave our deepest breath to Earth and Sky, naming them Home again, one voice ringing ridge to ridge of the listening trees, the circle of mountains (the kids meanwhile preparing their surprise, a parade of noises and that anarchist hymn, laughter)

The silence of all but poets and children stole away again through the jubilee, a mute elder on crutches, lifting wild antlers at the edge of the forest and vanishing toward twilight (the poets alone watching, silent amid the celebration, and scribbling it all down)

In the Summer of the Dragon

Angelina National Forest, Texas, 1988

I.

The old bus was resting on its perpetual right-of-way, the highway shoulder, while we slept: steel-hulled seed of dreams, its day-glo signs and slogans of Peace invisible and shining in the dark

Sometimes you can just feel the whole journey tip into the mythic

This old bus is older than I am, veteran of the Great March for Global Disarmament, code name “Middleskool,” its arch of ceiling scrawled forever with echoing voices of kids—)

afterward, admiring its hardwood, I turn the journey like a pebble in my pocket and consider how the currents have their way even with the stone*

(We must have crossed the vanished, shining track of those legendary walkers somewhere on that journey down the Mississippi, endless valley of that night)

“Going to the Rainbow,
Going to the Rainbow, Someday we’re all gonna get back Home”

II.

“Woman,” the dying messenger cried out, “behold your son—”

We all came out of different high schools, facing our cafeteria trays again, jogging in a dream in the middle of the gym class, searching the faces in the hall for the one that looks, watching for something in the look that shines and vanishes—

This can't be real, this can't be how you conjugate the verb “to live”— a Hollywood fistfight in the parking lot, padded gangs brawling under floodlights every Saturday night, polished cruisers out racing the stoplights—

One by one we came to the woods.
By random wandering in the thousand lost directions we found the real country we’d pledged our hearts to all those years while we covered our hearts with our hands

(Country so quiet it needs no name, country only its yearning exiles have learned to call “Peace”)

Step by misstep, leap by suicidal leap into the black cavern inside we groped to a true divinity, the temple they cut down to build the churches, the light we meditated on Sunday after Sunday through the colored glass—(Temple so ancient it blooms again each spring and makes fruit, sanctuary only the wounded even need to call “Healing”)

*What could be more ridiculous than a prophet in the wilderness?
By U.S. Forest Service count, four thousand four hundred of us . . .*

III.

Ah,
Texas was a strange one —the flotilla of pleasurecraft bobbing perpetually just offshore, sunbathers watching the mud-bathers, waterskiers watching the kite-flyers, the almost-naked watching the ones who wore no clothes

though the difference between us was even less than that I heard of one or two that figured it out and splashed ashore

—the brother in the mint white '67 Thunderbird who didn't know the woods were sacred that week till a choir of strangers sat chanting in front of his bumper, one last outnumbered and surrounded Texan

I saw him later with some tattooed biker brothers grinning into the fire*

—“Six up!” echoing along the road again, guns in church: pistols hooded in their holsters, shotguns riding silent in the green jeeps dusting us again with powdered clay, pale faces peering from the tight necks of their uniforms, young men once upon a time in love with this wilderness

we too brought our vehicles in and parked them casually between the pines*

Yes, Texas was a strange one

IV.

But sometimes you can feel the whole journey just trip

She was waving to slow them down, I guess fearlessly she stood in their way

I was at Info Center, heard the whole thing over CB

“Stop it, stop the brown jeep!”

They never even made it to the Front Gate and the District Special Agent caught them himself, the instantaneous legend ran—

Emblem of our Gathering for Peace and Healing
—our sister No Guns run down in Main Circle by a panicky kid

“Air evacuation!” someone kept shouting “No breathing, no pulse, no nothing, get a helicopter in here!”

But they brought an ambulance instead, a runner passing the cry to clear the road

eight broken ribs, a punctured lung . . .

She left us a message, lying in the mud of Texas: she left us a mantra.

“No blame. No revenge.”

And the next day at noon when we lifted our silence and our joined hands to the humid sky, the Peace and Healing came down at last, shining and disappearing into the dry mud flats, the nervous creases of uniforms, the cynical shoes of the tourists, into the sweat of shitter-diggers and the steam of the cooking-pots, seeking its level among us

The mayor of Zavalla came in person to thank us for bringing the rain (and all those one dollar bills)

But we knew who to thank

(Of course we knew all the time, too, why it had to rain

The tourists and the press didn't find out till three days later the sky began to clear and the invincible rainbow linked the island to the shore, shining and vanishing again

But by then the press and the tourists had begun to clear as well)

V.

The brokenhearted young man and the grieving woman must have looked a long time into one another's faces before they understood his last broken parable: “Behold your mother—”

We gather in the fold of the unchurched We, tired of preaching We gather up the unloved as disciples gathered crumbs after the feast so that none go wasted We, natives of one Mother, natives of one another

We gather on the ground of our common birth (we eat, we love, we disagree, we defecate) and put up the flowering tents of our belief: colors as many as the gazes that turn toward a single sunset, each an outpost of the daylight shining on a while into the dark

Sweeping out the bus afterward, following the curve of the baby grand, gathering little piles of the dust of Texas, I'm recalling how the ocean's dumb weight presses grains of sediment to solid stone

We gather
 under the vast flag of stars to chant the pulse and breathing of one body dancing on a hundred thousand feet We feed our fire with sticks of incarnated light, grasp hands in one more circle around the sun

(But Texas, Texas was a strange one)

The last campfire will outlive the final lightbulb, the living skin of the drum will outlast the radio tower

We have always been sitting here content with the night and our suppers, staring through the last silent coals into something invisible and vanishing

The east is glowing. We have work to do.

Children of the Canyon

Humboldt National Forest, Nevada, 1989

1.

Looking down from the rocks on the canyon rim into the cleft of her womb, I follow the trail that winds down through the Gathering.

I see the fire at Kiddy Village.
I see blue tarps by the river.
I watch the children of the canyon climbing and descending the windy face of the Mother.

Across the canyon her high rocky bosom holds the snow up to the sun.
They are drinking it down below.
A horizon of mountains receding to the ancestors, sky-color.

For miles behind me the plateau breathes a single scent: the sage.
This place is holy. (Every place is holy now that we have noticed.)

Clouds have come over at last to soothe the hot dust of the long walk from the parking lot, but the desert sun still glows in these many-colored companions, rock and lichen.

One by one the brothers and sisters climb the hill

(Our faces glowing every color the sun has yet invented)

In silence on a hot dirt track, the barefoot pilgrims cross the lower meadow

(Our bare feet all identical the color of this high desert dust)

In the upper meadow, an ancient lake bed, they gather in concentric circles around no particular center

(It's the way a politician talks to a prophet: a light plane whining insect-size across the vastness of our silence)

Among the gathered a silence gathers greater than their own; a patience, sun-fired, waiting to be broken (It's the way the prophet replies to the politician: as if listening for water in a wilderness of rock and light)

The silence breaks at noon.
They sing its song, the nameless syllable that seems to echo from the source of all water to the rim of the world—(Beyond, a dustcloud and a shifting of gears: someone has just left us. Someone has arrived.

The world nags its litany of wars and rumors.)

The children of the canyon sing the river on down the mountain into deeper rivers, drum all rivers Home to the sea—(Invisible along the rim the telephoto lenses gather all this light into a box of darkness.

No, our silence does not dissipate unheard.)

The snow melts on the mountain. Sandstone trickles away to be reborn. The children stream out from the center of the meadow to encircle it, one hand reaching for the next until an instant of completion passes like a pulse around the circle, unnoticed and unknowable—

3.

All night Sarah sings to her unborn son.
With every breath of the candlelight and cedar under Joe's blue tarp she keeps calling to their baby boy the wordless syllable of his first name.

In the early light above the rush of the river over stones, at last he answers:
thick black hair like his papa, baby-flesh the color of this canyon but waterborne like these smooth river-stones, not that rough weathering of sand in wind above—

Little caterpillar of a bud on a twig suckling her wild breast, springwater in the canyon

The neighbors come bringing presents, plates of food, soft strumming, anything to partake of this moment's preciousness (all moments are precious now that we discover them)

The brothers and sisters oblivious above,
the cops, the thieves, trash-haulers, hitchhikers, all of us oblivious newborn.

The Drums of Katuah

Superior National Forest, Minnesota, 1990

Coming up the main trail I can tell I'm getting close: the drums. Have I missed dinner?

Climbing the mud path through the trees I can hear among the hollow harmony of drumskins a clatter of forks and spoons on plates and cups—just in time. I join the serving line.

The drummers are gathered in the kitchen where the servers ladle soup and smile.
My dish is a deli container. My spoon is a groundscore.
I dig them from my daypack and join the drumming.

*Ho! drummers of Katuah kitchen, don't you hear the thunder? Are your tarps tight?
Are your dry clothes sealed in plastic?
Careful with that rhythm stolen from the rain!*

Someone fills a pot to keep some soup warm for the drummers. They thunder on till everyone is fed and all the plates and cups and forks and spoons are clean.

The leftovers will keep awhile.
The drums of Katuah thunder on.

Council Fire

Superior National Forest, Minnesota, 1990

Pilgrimage to the old power spot, our abandoned council circle—

I meet all the pilgrims packing out their tents and trash-bags

I find a giant fire-pit dug here since we counceled hard for three hours in the sun to move the council closer to the center of camp

Three pilgrims rest here on a log:
they too casually join the council of all vanished tribes around the coals of the original fire

The Circus of Visionaries

Green Mountain National Forest, Vermont, 1991

The clouds move through a silence above the bird-songs

between the dim ridge of dawn and the crescent moon like a shoal of whales, one after the other

the young ones still forming crowding close under their dark bellies

the whole clan taking on substance against the daybreak, traveling the high currents on their ancient way

Spirit, my tribe too is migrating once more, seeking our direction in the ancient way.

We have just retired the feather for the night;
the third day of the Vision Council breaks.

Since we began we have wandered the whole map, following this feather around our circle.
We go to our rest as the cooks are waking.

All afternoon outside the yellow-striped medicine tent where we listened in our rapt circle, the rest of the tribe was working: hauling out the trash, separating glass and metal and plastic, covering the shit in our latrines and scattering the hearthstones of our many circles back to where the glaciers left them a lingering warmth and everlasting memory in them, flutes and drums, song after song to the vanishing of flame

(I know, because today I spent breaking down the Wise Crackers kitchen, trusting the visionaries in the circus tent to listen without me)

The feather was an eagle's, it flew from a staff, then alone, it changed to an owl's, it became a rock, then a peacock feather.
We listened.

(It had rained the morning of the 7th, so the Council started in the big tent where the medics dealt with a half-dozen cases of craziness this Gathering)

The sun stood above us; someone started taking down the canvas around the sides, and mountains too stood listening.
 One after the other we stood to speak our pieces of the shattered dream.

 (Once it started, there it sat, the feather progressing slowly around the same circle of faces always changing, each one stepping back after speaking, leaving space for the listener behind)

 The earth turned and we listened. Like tattered seamstresses, we drew the thread of our attention tighter and tighter, focused on the feather as though following the point where the tip of the needle gleams and disappears.

The sun went down:
 no decision till daylight.
 For miles around us the work is done for today.
 Not here; we lit candles and kept listening.

The sun stood above us again the second day curtained by showers as the clouds moved across the mountaincrest. We listened.

In the afternoon the rainclouds passed and a rainbow lifted all the colors hidden in our circle way up into the air.
Two rainbows. Three concentric rainbows, with one half-grown young one still forming—

It was a sign, to be sure (to be sure and listen, pass the feather on and on till all the colors have spoken, the quilt of vision complete ...)

We passed the feather clockwise— our clock slower than the digits on my watch, I noticed—sunwise, always slower than the circling of shadows, it seemed. But wisdom flowed from somewhere, out of crones and greybeards, out of the drooling mouths of babes ...

The happy stream of voices out on the main trail and the sanctuary of listening made a kind of harmony where I stood on the edge of the circle, returning just after sundown of the second day.

The candles were already burning: no decision tonight.

Good. Time now for the listening.

On the muddy road outside, the footprints of loved ones blot out the footprints that were there moments before.

Every so often our asking for a true direction home is pierced by the laughter of farewell.

At midnight against the flung stars tall shafts of light leaned in a parallel rank over our council from the northern horizon

It was a sign, to be sure (to be sure and speak from our humble prayer-rug of earth, gazing to the stars, not the other way around)

The feather migrated on from hand to hand in the candlelight.

I am no longer waiting for my turn to speak, turning over what to say.

I am listening.
Through every interruption, the Spirit speaks.

We listened.
We laughed together.
A prayer, a confession, a speech.
No one wept alone.
Many visions.

The night passes so quickly when you really listen! Effortless.

Three times
we asked for consensus. We're learning.

The feather goes so slowly around.
At last it reaches my hand. I look around, and I'm the last one left.

What shall I say, Spirit?

*At last it's dawn, and the birds' turn. Today sunshine.
All my relations.*

A-Ho!

Lost at the Gathering

21st Rainbow Family Gathering
Mesa Verde National Forest, Colorado, 1992

Lost at the Gathering! It brings back memories: passing the endless parade of strangers singing “Happy Trails”—

(When everyone who passes you is grinning, you know you’re headed in the right direction!)

Occasionally a face you know from somewhere, also lost, and suddenly one you’ve been watching for all day, all week, headed the other way—

(This might be our only chance to catch up, who knows if we’ll cross trails again this Gathering?)

While the beaming clouds float by our meadow in blossom: kitchens tied to trees, a Tipi Circle, a pyramid of prayer-flags, a banner billowing like a sail full of breeze, the psychedelic stones and wee shy flowers— a snowy range looming over every conversation—

(The first scout who found this place must have suffered the same jolt of heaven: Welcome Home . . .

Even now, one small plane whining like a mosquito at the screen, Here let all children of the Creation be equal and free, here let our ideals be true, let us be true to our ideals . . .)

Thank God for the mud when it’s dusty

And thank the Goddess for stones to walk on where it’s muddy

Unified Field

Mesa Verde National Forest, Colorado, 1992

Every time you touch someone today, even a handshake Close your eyes, remember the last time you touched warm skin through the layers of cloth, talk, custom And then open, look into the eyes of the one you are hugging, rubbing, wrestling, baby-powdering, leading into the dance, making change for, helping up into the bus: Trace the chain of touching to the fingertips of time, and calculate the great circle we’ll make when we all meet in one
on that final Fourth of July at her breast, long feather curving from her hand toward the sky

Green boughs reaching down across her vision toward the yellow clay

The council circle sits here in a fork in the road: pine-shadows turn another inch as the sun travels west and the feather passes

The Bridge that Merges with the Stream

22nd annual Rainbow Family Gathering Talladega National Forest, Alabama, 1993

In the distance the drums are still speaking their hollow hearts to the ground.
In the stillness close by, birds are starting to sing.

At dawn of the last day, heading home to bed, I finally meet my ride out. We arrange a rendezvous.

Walking upstream along the bank of the creek as the water walks over its stepping-stones downstream, I come to the bridge:

three logs, lashed and anchored, a handrail of ropes.
Once more my path has crossed the journey of the water.

Lugging two buckets of springwater from the hose up the hill for the ceremony of the washing of cans, up the long curve of Alabama clay smoothed by the naked feet of love, up to Supply where the fingers of evolution are sorting the trash, I come to the road.

In Law and Order We Trust!

Official green trucks roll by on their mission of reconnaissance.
Once more my path is about to cross the tiretracks of war.

*How do you stop a gathering of free people?
Not with guns. The pistols ride blindfolded in their holsters.
It's done with camcorders collecting license plates.
It's done with directional mikes.
It's done with roadblocks and the language of regulations.*

These men and women in uniform have sworn to uphold the Constitution all day in the hot sun.
But a filedrawer in Washington holds the mortgage papers on each one's conscience, the salary and benefits, the photographs of dependents.
The badges gleaming on their uniforms are only to armor the heart.

Twice a day, though, standing naked in front of the mirror in the locker room or the privacy of home, they are brothers and sisters of the bellybutton, like us, every mole and wart-hair precious to the Creator . . .

3.

Lying down to sleep at last among feathery ferns, under wild grapevines, at home under my plastic tarp in an overgrown clearcut beside the creek, I come to the end of the path: once more I am crossing where there is no bridge, beginning to drift downstream

*We are riding together the long current of living to the living sea, despite our many deaths along the way:
a river of sweat and footsteps, crates of food disappearing down the trail, compost and feces covered with earth and left behind, as one by one so are we—*

Why the checkpoint at the end of the road home, where we leave our vehicles to walk in?
Because there we start across the imaginary bridge our ancestral dreamers built to the dreaming unborn, ephemeral arch of all colors, bridge that merges with the stream: with every step the earth grows more solid, licenses and insurance pale and fade . . . Moonrise reveals the peacefulness of strangers passing on the trails, tall briars reclaiming the meadow.

*Why do the patriarchs of our two-legged tribe try to dam that flow?
Why don't they listen to the mothers with the milk of it still wet on their nipples?
Why don't we let the newest naked baby lead the way?*

For a few minutes as the light grows steadily between the leaves, I slip under the current of darkness.
Then I get up and start to pack again for the struggle upstream.

Kudzu Curtains

Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, 1996

Out of the city's greasy armpit, alive!

Across the smoldering Southern summer into my own west wind

Over the bridge at Memphis, where I once caught that midnight ride

Nothing but miles out here between the speed limit signs

Down the long dusty back roads of Missouri, into Sam Clemens's own back woods

Into a pasture full of peacefully grazing cars and grinning people

Up an easy trail into the shady welcome of trees and running water

I haven't come so far from Georgia after all*

At Popcorn Palace
the price of admission is an empty bowl

At the swimming hole, you don't even need that much

A barefoot brother joins the morning jam: birds, mandolin

Far-off drummers . . . maybe I never actually left this place at all

Reunion of the Elements

Apache-Sitgreaves National Forest, Arizona, 1998

Overhead the sun approaches noon

Underfoot the rain has molded weeks of dust into firm mud

Since early morning I have wandered the trails of a vast camp fallen suddenly silent in consensus with the peace and healing of this wild place

Smoothed by passing feet, dried all morning in the kiln of sun to a warm living skin, every path this morning leads to the center where the procession of feet assembles around the Peace Pole in the meadow and concentric circle after circle of voices hold one Silence

But no one is more silent than the two sleeping sentries who guard last night's heroic firepit, one sprawled peacefully across its architecture of piled stones, the other cradled in its deep dry moat

This is the firepit constructed by the frenzied engineers of last night's boogie, eager for firelight and warmth, the ancient reunion of the elements, passing rocks hand to hand, digging in time to the drums, chanting thanks to the rain we'd all prayed for

Year after year we grumbled about the rain, forgetting to be thankful, until this year of wildfire and drought: night after night we sat staring into the campfire in ignorant bliss, forgetting to be grateful, until we came to this dry place heaped with dry firewood in this dry season— Season of the Fire Ban

It's our Season of the Fire Watch: wood-gatherers hauling propane tanks, cooks stirring huge pots of beans over thin blue flames, minstrels trading songs all night around a dwindling candle, fire-tenders transmuted into fire-trolls, patrolling miles of trails through the dry woods, each one breathing the dust of a multitude of feet

*Maybe it was our Native elders who brought the rain with their traditional prayers; maybe it was the children and their raindance.
But no precipitation was predicted here till August, the Rangers said, and yesterday when it fell it fell nowhere else in the state*

The clouds came out of nowhere and gathered in a circle around this mountain, the eyewitnesses say, and after that first ghostly mist of rain— so gentle that it seemed the clouds were only passing through like the rest of us— according to the rumor, a rainbow arched over in a shower of sun

All around this meadow the aspen groves join the consensus of silence, surrounding our concentric circles like slender shining angels lifting wings of silvery green: joined underground by a common root-system, someone told me, into a single organism

Even the arid soil beneath my blanket is a woven mat of root-threads, I can see now, sitting here: a prayer-rug peculiarly suited to silence, decorated here and there with the prehistoric paisley of the lichen-spotted stones

And the heroic builders of last night's firepit? vanished like the shamans of the Stone Age leaving only the ceremonial ordnance of their office—two shovels, standing upright while the sentries sleep, three five-gallon buckets of water

A helicopter overhead barely penetrates as the Silence approaches zenith

A wind blows across the faces gathered in the meadow

The earth turns underfoot

A multitude of hands take hold of one another and we rise to sing the Om

Rattlesnake Tribe / Lightning Nation

 Allegheny National Forest, Pennsylvania, 1999

Somewhere out there roaming the wild vistas of the heart, I've heard, is a tribe anyone can join

We are the forest sprouting up through leaf-duff and fern under the spreading limbs of our elders, tying and re-tying our knots till we learn the art of the stormtight shelter

 on the free horizon, the family of all opposites is converging from the seven directions Home*

We are the meadow waking one morning between unfamiliar streams of footsteps and voices, remembering from some distant generation of meadowgrass a dream of firelight and drumming

Somewhere in the heart-pulse of light and dark, the long-lost orphans of the Earth are gathering for the reunion feast

We are the stream singing to every pebble and boulder we meet on our way in a babble of continuous praise, a parade of barefoot pilgrims chanting holy laughter, forever seeking the easiest way downhill

Somewhere in a sweaty flashback hallucinations are hugging, the annual parliament of anarchists is assembling

We are the mountain sheltering its immaculate community under broad leafy wings, protecting the Indiana bat and the Eastern timber rattler, offering a home to all creatures too wild for the human zoo

Somewhere far below the deep blue sky the armies of every continent and faith link hands across the wildflowers to dance

We are the rainstorm sailing high on its weatherfront between the mountain ridges, roaring its drunken guffaw just to hear the valleys echo, shooting down electric dragon-talons at whoever stands tallest

Somewhere high above the treetops a prayer sung in all the languages of silence breaks the surface of sound

We are the rainbow shining after the storm, arched from cloud to cloud like a bridge between hardships, a path from one lesson to the next, disappearing when the last of us has crossed the abyss

Somewhere asleep in your classroom reveries and cubicle daydreams is the vision of a tribe anyone can join

We are the poison fangs of rattlesnake and lightning, the rocky trails, the slick mud, the haze of humidity, even the biting swarms of Pennsylvania State Police on our dirt roads: this year's catechism and curriculum

Somewhere deep in the Earth under your next step, and the next, the vision breathes on and on and on

We are everything we have endured together, year after year, and we carry it with us always from now on, stronger every summer— thanks and praises! than we were the year before

The Miracle of the Silence

Beaverhead National Forest, Montana, 2000

What is the sound of twenty thousand people holding one silence?

It's louder than the brother camped behind me who hears silence as a challenge and bellows out his battle cry—louder than the barking watchdog tied at his camp—louder than the four small airplanes that fill the sky with their lonely circling, their noisy longing to join us—louder than the one deaf drummer in the distance who never even heard of silence—louder even than the children congregating at Kid Village to be painted for their parade (their screams of laughter or frustration high homage to the Mother and Father of all that lives...)

What is this miracle so many have gathered in this dry mountain meadow to listen for?

It's the silence
that was here before we came, the silence that will remain when we have broken up these trails and gone—the silence of herds of caribou, bison, elk who have ceded this valley to an army of cattle, the silence of mountain grasses that surrendered to the invading sage—it's the silence of the Bitterroot Range, the snowy divide where rain and meltwater start for the Pacific or the Mississippi, looking down on this overgrazed rangeland ringed with clearcuts we have claimed for Home

(but it's also the scrape of a shovelblade digging through the glacial till for a slit latrine, hard work with this tin entrenching tool...)

Who has ever heard the hush from dawn till noon of every language and dialect of the most talkative species on Earth?

It is my own inner silence before the music of Creation, contemplating the microscopic mysteries of the dirt beneath my knees, the endless transmigrations of the clouds, breathing the sacred incense of the sage and pondering paradox—
 a silence of sunlight and thunder, of friendly raindrops that wet down the dust, falling soundlessly out of bright clear sky to speckle the path before me (vast wild skylscapes and snowpeaked vistas looming over every shoulder, no matter who I hug...)

What is the sound of high noon in this cathedral where no church towers chime, temple of ten thousand Millenniums?

It's the overlapping ripples of a distant chant of Om
 as a multi-colored cluster breaks open like a seed and sends out shoots that blossom into random segments of a circle—it's those rippling rainbow arcs of people holding hands breaking up and moving back and re-connecting again and again until suddenly I stand squinting a quarter-mile across to my counterpart on the other side—it's the silence

 that goes on and on across the meadow till the Children's Parade arrives (though the circle's several ends never absolutely meet, and the chant never travels all the way around, still...)

What is this peace that passes understanding hand to hand around our slowly forming, dissolving and expanding, never quite unbroken circle?

It's the silence of the wind playing with a kite, someone on a parasail playing with the wind, the cold creeping in with the shadowline against the precious gold of sun—it's that clear, ancient silence of stars unfurling like the spangled banner of infinity, glittering in the treetops while the watch-fires burn along the ridgecrest and the crescent moon grins more brightly each night (but it's also the chorus of drums from two different campfires on either side of the hill behind Info beating in unison, keeping one heartbeat through the silence between random love-calls across the night...)

Evergreen Lotus Mandala

Boise National Forest, Idaho, 2001

1. BEAR VALLEY

"This talk is like stamping new coins. They pile up, while the real work is done outside by someone digging in the ground."

Rumi

The broad flat meadow laps against pine-crested ridges like a lake of wild grasses, scattered yellow and purple flowers and dry sandy dirt

Distant figures make their way across as if walking on water

(Nothing on Earth could be more beautiful except these slit latrines gradually filled with human manure, tree-ash and handfuls of soil, then dug all over again a spade's length away)

Water so transparent it shimmers in the sun like liquid light runs over beds of precious stones where the young salmon feed, spanned by bridges of lashed pine poles

Children and greyhairs, longhairs, no-hairs meander among the pine-needled clan (Nothing on Earth could be more peaceful except those dusty feet crossing the bridges in the dry heat all day without stepping down into the clear, cool, shallow paths of the endangered salmon)

The waxing moon glides down across this high mountain valley into the trees, translucent and luminous as a red-hot stone entering the sweat lodge

Nomads wander the dusty moonlit trails from kitchen-fire to kitchen-fire, adrift on her tide

(Nothing on Earth could be more lovely except these bags of garbage washed and sorted for recycling because in nature nothing ever, ever goes to waste)

"A circle of lovely, quiet people becomes the ring on my finger."

Silence walks the trails this morning while last night's late carousers sleep it off

Till almost dawn they fired their arching streamers and blossom-bursts of voices and drums across the dark

Now silence drifts down the mountainsides like mist, filtering with the daylight through a forest of young pines to fill the waking valley (overrunning cup of silence—)

Early risers meeting on the path say nothing, though their eyes exchange light and every so often two hearts greet each other with a long, silent hug (mute conversation of heartbeats—)

Silence radiates from an island of quiet in the center of the meadow as a slow procession converges from every direction at once and for a long unbroken moment, hands grasping hands along the shore of a vast lake of silence, peace has come

(Nothing on Earth could be more sacred except the hot work of aerating, mulching and re-seeding the abandoned kitchens and trails, scattering oven-stones, burning bridges)

3. MANDALA

“Suppose you scrub your ethical skin until it shines, but inside there is no music, then what?”

Kabir

Somewhere in this circle of thousands stands a 30-year-old who has never seen fireworks on the Fourth of July

The young ones are with us holding the silence

Longhaired teenage boys picking up the weapons of peace, shovel, mattock, saw, suddenly boys no more—shaven and ponytailed Hare Krishna monks chasing a frisbee after the pots are scrubbed—young women with slender wrists and firm palms confidently addressing the spirit of the drum, singing to the fire—a parade of wild kids more innocent than we were, wiser than we'll ever be, gaining on us year by year, inch by inch—

 sounding the Om

(And nothing on Earth could be more precious until they arrive one year smiling, stunned, shy, holding one more howling infant because in a family not one child ever goes to waste)

Pick up any pine cone, turn it upside down and gaze into the thousand-petaled lotus mandala of generations of evergreen

Grandmother, father, daughter!
Grandfather, mother, son!
I see it now: the shortest distance between any three points is a circle

Babylon Come Home!

31st annual Rainbow Family Gathering
Ottawa National Forest, Michigan, 2002

As above, so below

Laughter through the trees along the trail, wind playing high in the branches while children play among the ferns—The woods are alive with people at work like a convention of beavers, building a village of sticks and tarps and string that will stand forever in the memories of these kids

The forest is my church

Following a call for circle, I found a kitchen in a clearing and a couple hundred strangers holding hands.
There's always room for one more.
In the center of the circle giant pots of food sat steaming while a sister prayed, a brother complained, and we all sang. Then we sat down on the grass and the servers started their procession around, following the holy jug of handwash.

*How did we ever get so scattered?
Which lifetime did we learn this trick of dividing and conquering ourselves?
Who sold us the latest technology of separation, these deadbolts and fences, tinted windows and alarms, and how long must we keep paying?*

A circle of drummers serenading the brown glitter of current downstream around a double horseshoe bend—The water is alive with people at play like a tribe of hippopotami, while just upstream of the bridge, three solar panels pump riverwater through the filters into an endless queue of cups and waterbottles

Water is my sacrament

On one side, the riverbank was crowded with citizens exercising their sacred right to assemble.
Across the bridge, lawmen played cavalry, defending the holy relics of an archeological site where loggers dumped their trash while they milled the local sacred groves into money— (though the real ruins were bulldozed by the Forest Service years ago, local oldtimers say)

Babylon is only a state of mind

Half
sacred tobacco,
half profane plastic: detach
with a twist, pocket the filter and tenderly split the paper, sprinkle grateful prayers beside whatever path you wander

We all have a role to play in the melodrama of history, however minute. Mine this year is made up of a couple dozen small services: refilling handwash at the Kid Village latrine, digging through Lost and Found to recover a sister's green-rimmed glasses, a brother's pocketknife on its loop of hand-braided hemp, policing the trails from the blacktop down to the river—

Babylon, come home!

I met a fellow from back home assisting with a birth at his first Gathering, he said, taking a break to hurry back and zip his tent before the rain—and later I heard how Stella Rainbow was born just before we all looked up and saw the rainbow

A naked woman is a pure vision of the Divine.
 Don't confuse it with desire!
 Learn to look without lust, meet her eyes without shame and you may be ready for a grown-up woman of your own.
 Maybe even this one passing on the trail right now, glancing shyly back— (but even a woman fully clothed is a Goddess incognito, brother, beware!)

The Gathering is bigger than the Family

Two eagles circling above our circle in the Silence on the Fourth, as people continue endlessly to arrive—advancing weaponless down the hill, almost wordless across the forbidden bridge and up the grassy slope to take the hilltop in the Name Unspoken

— While I still lingered at Info, one hand flat against a brother's back, listening through the Silence
 as he spilled out his anger and heartbreak.
 His irreplaceable blue backpack— stolen or spaced on a supply run?
 It didn't matter. His faith was shaken and his shoulders rocked with the sobs of a man working hard for nothing but love, cheated out of his wages in the end.

If here, then everywhere: Babylon come home

I hope he at least looked up to see the sundog that circled the sun in the clear blue sky after the Silence broke into celebration—I hope he looked down a night or two later to see the candlelit mud altar along the main trail covered with intricate mud sculptures, a miniature pueblo along the mud bank where tiny mud people waved from ladders and hammocks at the passing multitude . . .

As above, so below.
 Spirit manipulating the manipulators in the council, leading us Home again and again.
 Bureaucracy entangling the bureaucrats, hierarchy foiled by hierarchy, officers of the peace restrained from disrupting an illegal prayer for Peace.

 The river of Love flowing on to the sea without ceasing, carrying off the sediment of sorrow, the salt of sweat, the droplets of heaven that fall when the clouds can no longer contain their love for the Earth—

*The Family is bigger than the Gathering.
 Babylon, come home!*

Spirit Hunt

33rd annual Rainbow Family Gathering
 Modoc National Forest, California, 2004

“We each speak our piece; that’s our duty to our people. That’s why each of us is a leader.
 That’s Indian Way. That’s true democracy . . .”

Leonard Peltier, Prison Writings

My candleflame burns serenely at the center of a vast spinning pinwheel of planets and stars—campfires, lanterns, flashlights twinkle through the woods and across the meadow, carrying the holy burden of light

On the road up this mountain we passed miles of old clearcuts, acres of fire-blackened trunks, one silver sports car spun sideways into the ditch . . .
 At the end of the road we hiked down into a valley of delicate streams and wetlands littered with cowpies, invaded by sagebrush, surrounded by hillsides of aspen and Washoe pine under towering purple outcrops of volcanic stone graven by the wind into abstract images of time.

The birthing stones.

This place has ghosts.
 Not just artifacts— a hasty government archeological survey carted off a truckload just before the Gathering, lost arrowheads of legendary hunters which the local tribes may get back one day—No, the prehistoric memory of this place whispers of hungry winters, of herds that no longer came, fences, cattle, drink and disease, assimilation by massacre, a people hunted almost to extinction like so many indigenous others . . .

The burial grounds.

Between the birthing stones and the burial grounds
 we gather—
 a tribe of palefaces with suntans, born-again Indians, mystics, misfits, visionaries and contraries—to learn this year's lesson.

It's our annual Spirit Hunt.

My pen-tip scratches at the silence in the center of an enormous nonstop merry-go-round of noises—drums, dogs, laughter, far-off horns and nearby guitars, murmurs of gossip or philosophy from the camp next door, distant shouts of desperation or joy awakening the sacred power of sound long after midnight . . .

"No yelling in the woods!"

I wake in bright daylight surrounded by miles of silence, camp after camp after camp, as far as I can hear (ignoring the interruptions, as always—)

But once again I've drawn the morning shift on Independence Day: a fresh latrine that should have been ready yesterday.

Digging into rich black dirt with my borrowed spade, I hear their voices echo across the valley of silence like grieving ghosts of some lost language:

*This valley is sacred,
 every sprig, every streamlet, every stone.
 This soil is home to our ancestors' bones.*

Right now on eBay, a Modoc skull commands $10,000.
 They can't even tell us where not to dig!

This was a summer hunting camp once, sacred ceremonial ground, gathering place for many tribes over many millennia.
 One week after we gather here, the sheep and cattle will return for a Forest Service demonstration project, “sustainable grazing.”

Our Silence this morning answers: Yes.
This valley is sacred.
Every sprig.
Every streamlet.
Every stone.

But scraping and chopping at that Silence, one end of my long narrow trench already three feet deep and open for business, I remember countless holes I’ve dug, every one of them in sacred ground, disturbing somebody’s ancestors.
How can we honor those sleeping spirits of defeated warriors, the widows and orphans of this land?
How can we honor our own ancestors who innocently murdered them like so many buffalo, who burned their villages to save their souls, whose own bones lie in stolen ground?

Our Modoc and Paiute elders want us to haul in chemical toilets.
To dig a hole here, any hole, they have to wait months for a permit!
Of course, if anyone had ever struck gold here, oil or uranium, by now this entire valley would be one gigantic hole.
And if anything could be more absurd than squatting over a slit trench in paradise, it’s trucking tanks of excrement preserved in chemicals back to civilization for “treatment.” No matter where they dump that weird blue solution, it was somebody’s paradise once . . .

Scooping out another shovelful of my Mother Earth, alert for artifacts,
I look up to see a silent sister smiling. I point to the open end, but she shakes her head and takes the shovel from my hand.
Before our new neighborhood latrine is complete, three silent brothers have arrived to take their turns digging into the rich dirt, the sacred Earth, the holy morning of Silence.

Sanitation is sacred, too.
Cleanliness is godliness.
Keep the children healthy!
Health is wholeness is holy.
Hallelujah, ho!

Like a circle of tipi poles standing separately but leaning together in the center, withstanding the winds, our nation is gathered in circles within circles within circles within the circular horizon of the round Earth, linked hand to hand into something that soars invisibly skyward . . .

Everyone saw the brother on stilts and the rainbow kite that spun on its axis over our heads.
Did anyone but me see the white-painted mime gliding in slow motion around the circle as the Silence broke?
And how many trustworthy eyewitnesses saw the golden eagle that circled once above our radiant rippling song and flew north?

The Om dies away, wave after wave washing up the mountainsides that rim this valley, subsiding as the next arrives.
But the ripples that carry the sound from our hearts to our throats, expanding out of Silence to the Six Directions, pass through walls of hardened lava and armored steel and calcified childhood fear to engulf the living planet in a radiant embrace.

Hippy New Year! Hallelujah! Ho!

"You can't start a war over love."

Hippies reinventing the wheel! bicycles, wheelbarrows, carts and wagons navigating the trails after so many years of lugging it all—Jazz combo in the kitchen, bluegrass at Info—A queue with a view—That game of remembering names without nametags—
The green lighter that traveled around the world—A six-foot pedestal of stones balanced on stones that sprang up beside the trail—Free sandal repair and footwashing at Jesus Camp—Hug vortex on the trail, every long-lost bosom-buddy reunion just another eddy in the flow—

"I actually went to a barber— I know it looks like I cut it myself . . ."

It hurts to see our Grandmother Earth trod to dust, her summer adornments broken under blind feet

It's hard to watch these Grandfather Rocks with their ancient psychedelic lichen worn away by children's shoes

But it heals to hear the Water Child slip away through her meandering channels, only to bubble up from the spring, always laughing, young again

Wandering our nation of neighborhoods, slowly learning the trails, I come limping along in the footsteps of the first explorers looking for kitchen sites, amazed at the power of the place even now—

"Well, my cat destroyed my air mattress, but that was inevitable..."

It's our annual summer
Spirit Hunt.
No matter how good we get at gathering, every year the spirits conspire to teach us something.
It's a hard lesson sometimes, often humbling, always heartfelt.

And every year it leaves us stronger.

Each one of us imagines we know why we traveled here.
But once we arrive in the forest, a Silence begins to grow inside. An emptiness.
A listening . . .
though sometimes the voices that instruct us crack like thunder's whip, impossible to ignore.

This year the whole encampment carries on all week that council where the native elders spoke.
In campfire debates, kitchen-talk and trail-colloquies, a vast circle of separate views all turn to face one center: the grief that soaks this continent's soil, the weight of our footprints here, the healing this land has given us and the honoring we owe in return.

How many centuries will it take to heal the centuries of heartache?
Some brothers and sisters among us, both Native and paleface, have spent most of their lives beginning it or seeking a place to begin.
How many of them have found it here in this valley between birth and death?
That we won't know until next summer, in some other valley.

But be warned.
The spirits delight in playing trickster, planting spores in cracks where we won't spot them till we're thoroughly colonized by the mysterious mycellium of love:
and love, in the right conditions, can sprout overnight its mind-altering mushrooms of hope and purpose in the brain.
Your life may change tonight!

And somehow,
if we can keep the children healthy and the memories of these elders alive, we may serve as a bridge between generations where the spirits of this valley may walk safely across the abyss of five hundred years.
And like the final elder who spoke, his anger spent, surrounded by circle upon circle of respectful listeners, some quietly weeping, may the children of the palefaces receive them with a simple prayer:

Just me
and the mossy pines, the volcanic boulders, the yellow and purple flowers of this mountain meadow, the dirt road underfoot and my bag of garbage:
last trip out.

Bless this land for giving us so much!
Bless the elders who came to teach this tribe of orphans!
Bless the spirits who brought us together!

Forgive us, Mother, for our footsteps here.
Thank you, Creator, for those selfsame steps on the long trail home.

Happy trails!
Hippy New Year!
Hallelujah!
Ho!

Children Come in All Sizes

Monongahela National Forest, West Virginia, 2005

“Now so many people that are in this place.
In our meeting place.
It starts when two people see each other.
They greet each other.
Now we greet each other. . . .
This is the way it should be in our minds.”

Thank You: A Poem in 17 Parts (Seneca tribe)

Ignore all rumors of cancellation of rumors: yes, there will be a Gathering

Those West Virginia country roads took us Home to a subarctic island of cranberry bog pushed south by glaciers an age ago and abandoned here to be fostered and adopted in a motherly fold of the Appalachian quilt like any other refugee.
A concrete flight of stairs interrupts the trail up to Main Meadow, relic of a prison camp for conscientious objectors during World War Two.
Among our neighbors a famous doctor who is also a clown, a small-town mayor who is also a poet, the usual white supremacist compound . . .

We are only the latest seekers of shelter to arrive.

And the children of the sunlight brought their children Home to the Mother of mountains for the yearly reunion of all relatives (though the bears and snakes and bugs and white supremacists never showed)

But children come in all sizes, from the ones expected any day now by two young mothers in camp and their midwives to the one on stilts with greying dreadlocks and a terminal grin towering over the hubbub and commotion...

At our campfires this year, the tellers of tales weave one more round of Hipstory: how the townspeople rallied in support of the barricaded Seed Camp till even the local Wal-Mart donated supplies, which the young warriors backpacked in through the woods night after night, dodging the police blockade, the infrared goggles and attack dogs—

And the light came down pure and whole and complete only to shatter against the rocks of West Virginia into ten thousand glints and glimmers of every possible hue

Children come in all sizes:
the happy trolls under the bridge knocking from below whenever footsteps cross the planks, the idle architects who built a metropolis of flat stacked stones in the rocky creekbed, the backwoods engineers who constructed kitchens, theaters and ovens out of mud and sticks and string, the fire-twirling dancers trailing flame around the boogie fire like a synchronized swarm of sparks—even my playmates at Front Gate, rebirthing not-so-ancient treasures of glass, aluminum, paper and plastic from the burial-mounds of trash bags

Fireflies cruise the dark bog in its shadowy bowl of mountains blinking back at the stars that gleam at intervals between the low clouds traveling through (Hello, fellow light in the darkness, can you tell me where this path goes?)

And the forest rang with echoes of the original note inventing the elements, mutating into endless phyla and genera, species and subspecies, multiplying and dividing into all the chords of Creation

Yes, children come in all sizes such as the pre-dawn adolescent with the grownup lungs who woke me just in time for the traditional morning of Silence on the Fourth, bellowing out his loneliness and boredom in a glossolalia de la Tourette's Sunrise through the mist over the cranberry bog gradually reveals beautiful meadow plants danced flat under naked, ecstatic feet (only to rise again, weeks from now, crowds of them swaying blissfully together under the sun just as we did—)

And a silence rose up with the morning fog from the mud of West Virginia as one by one the late-night screamers nodded off and missed it and the children woke up, eagerly heading for Kid Village to be decorated for the sacred day

Children come in all sizes, up to and including six-foot impostors re-living childhood in the Kids' Parade as I did this year, shaking my rattle up the muddy trail

near the tail of a long, snaking procession of painted faces and fairy wings, arriving at last in the open meadow where a cordon of cheering, clapping uncles and aunts opened gradually into a circle so enormous only a kid on stilts could have seen the other side

*And a circle of interlocking hands intersected with a circle of days and moons and seasons, the Silence broke and one more cycle was complete.
 Happy Interdependence Day!
 Happy Rebirthday!
 Happy New!*

Around the campfires, Hipstory's already woven into legend: how the blockaded Seed Camp finally withdrew to a government-approved site in a bog to save the endangered bats feeding their young around the meadow's edge—(doubly endangered, we learned later, since the locals lost their fight to stop a stone and gravel quarry permitted for that very spot)

Mountain Mama, almost Heaven, your green arms opened wide in welcome, gathered us into this valley's protection, drew us close together in your boggy lap for one slow, sunlit moment as if to claim all children everywhere, of every size, for yours . . .

And all you ask of us is to remember you when they try to sell us your hard black bones for fuel, your green hair for paper and wood, your endless tears in six-packs of little plastic bottles—

*Mother,
we're only children, but we'll try.*

Driving home from Home, we traveled underneath two mountains in well-lit tunnels and through one stormfront in a blinding barrage of rain.
On the other side, in the slant rays of late afternoon, a random drifting shred of humidity winked at us in a blaze of colors that vanished, only to wink again across the interstate:
a faint outline arched up against the slightly more solid shape of a cloud, and suddenly the most glorious rainbow since Noah's spanned the highway, a pale companion hovering just above it, and the long gathering between Gatherings had begun.

Yes, there is a pot of gold at the end of the Rainbow!
As soon as we have one sister and brother of every color, we'll circle up and dish out the soup.

"After having a dream let someone else guess what it was.
Then have everyone act it out together."

Along the Trail from Heart to Heart

Allegheny National Forest, Pennsylvania, 2010

for Enoch

Lights

cruising the woods at midnight mark the invisible trails that crisscross the blackness for miles around my tent

Early the next morning, sitting on my stoop of pine needles and duff amid sunlight and leaf-shadow, between birdsong and silence, I can't help noticing the light in every passing face

Duet of saxophone and flute soaring "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" from the trail above my camp

Down those trails worn smooth by the footprints of barefoot wanderers we go wandering in our turn, my traveling buddy and I, over log bridges packed with dried mud, two more sets of footsteps in the circumambulating parade: fire-trolls and water crew, supply sherpas and shitter-diggers, rainbows and bliss ninnies, this laughing, ranting, cursing, chanting spectrum of light walking upright

Pineapple pizza coming out of the mud oven till the wee hours the night we hiked in from Welcome Home

All these trees grew up together, dividing up the sunlight, sharing the rain,
giving voice to the wind, gradually filling every jigsaw piece of sky with interlacing branches that welcome all wandering visitors into their shelter and shade, while everywhere underfoot between the hospitable trunks that hold our tarps and banners high lies a cornucopia of firewood for the ovens and bliss fires, poles for kitchen rails and bridges, sticks for tables and counters, twigs for muddy spots on the trail, leaves and needles to cushion my sleep

I swear I saw you at the Gathering, about twenty years old and gorgeous, eyes lit up with that mysterious alchemy of transmuted sunlight, hair dark and wild like a sleeping memory of last night's holy bacchanal...
I don't think you recognized me

But sometimes I only recognize myself in the young warriors I pass on the trail, staring around shy and amazed at this impossible vision of tipis and trading blankets and smiling topless sisters, a tribal village floating full-blown out of the wild reaches of their imaginations, settling to earth in the Pennsylvania mud before their unbelieving eyes (and in one of those tipis we heard the saga of a busload of hippies who drove from New Mexico in a freshly converted biodiesel schoolbus, pulling in behind fast-food joints instead of the usual truck stops, working together like a ship's crew, hand-pumping used grease through their filters to re-fuel the mothership on its maiden voyage, their dog happily licking up the spills—)

Kitchen crew doing "You're So Vain" in five-part harmony chopping veggies for the stew

So where was I exactly when I set down my dish and went on a quest for fresh hot dishwater?
 "Not all who wander are lost," goes my motto this gathering.
 "Some of us only lost our stuff..."
 Of course I'll never find it till I stand in the uphill corner of the kitchen and holler it out—
 "Right over there by the dish station," someone casually informs me

"We're doing this on the sly," my traveling buddy quips to a pretty young sister who joins us to scrub a few pots, "pretending we're doing a job we don't like..."

The water here converges in wandering streams from the mountainsides that flank this valley, seeps up through the mud under sandals and boots and bare toes, hangs in steamy clouds of humidity, drips in branching runnels of sweat down painted faces and tattooed torsos, saturating tie-dyes and halter tops and sarongs, flows cold and muddy almost bellybutton-deep between naked bodies at the swimming hole, runs steadily from the circular lips of black waterpipe into the circular cups and containers of grateful humans taking our turn in the water cycle that keeps us all alive

Ping Pong in the nude across a slab of plywood in the meadow

That joyriding helicopter buzzing our six square miles of meadows and trails, burning precious hydrocarbons and fouling the atmosphere can't disturb the quiet breathing of these woods, can't interrupt the levity of fiddle and mandolin, the happy chatter of the kitchens, raucous drumming and hoots of laughter across the valley—

Even the one that circles low above the treetops on the morning of the Fourth as if under orders to desecrate our sacred morning of silence finally fades away, leaving the forest twice as quiet as before (and later that day we heard the saga of the kid who climbed the wrong tree in the dark hour before daylight, the dead branch that cracked under his weight, his broken pelvis and fractured skull, the medivac pilot who didn't trust the meadow so refused to land until a ground crew had hiked in to confirm safe landing—)

"Anybody got some helicopter repellent I can borrow?" asks my traveling buddy

The power of the drum not played, cradled under one arm down the trail to Main Meadow, idly caressed beside the warm ash of last night's boogie fire, all that leashed thunder held in check till the moment for celebration arrives—the power of this deliberate silence voicing a momentary absence of rancor and rivalry, the song of a deep listening, a loving drumroll of quiet, brainwaves and heartbeats aligned with the millennial meridians of the Earth, a peaceful, breathing presence of sunlight and silence . . .

The silence is sacred because we make it so:
 by discipline and attention, reverence and respect, aware that our one small particle of choice compounds with thousands of others into one huge fern-carpeted, tree-buttressed, sky-roofed cathedral of pure intent—a temple to the planetwide convergence of vision and will that must someday calm the noisy world of killer drones and car bombs and death camps (real ones, not just pretend)

Been rebelling against authority for 39 years now, long enough to raise our own crop of rebels, protesting the peace meditation on the Fourth

So where else can you say that waiting in line is the best part of your day? The old friend unseen for many a gathering, the new friend who hitched up from Florida for his very first one—Finally we reach the pushbutton hand-wash dispenser, the stainless steel pans heaped with pasta, the sublime grins of the servers, only to realize we've spaced out our plates and spoons again somewhere back along the trail . . .

"Some things can only be achieved by retroactive planning," my traveling buddy explains

A portable massage table headed into Kid Village for a "house call" as we head out after lunch

Go, team, go!
 The barefoot warriors who haul the food in, the garbage out, some exhausted mama's gear up and down these trails, the kitchen ogres and dinner-circle servers, radio-carriers and Info crew, not to mention a perimeter of warriors directing traffic on the roads, driving the supply trucks, dealing with the occasional armed gang in uniform, working the courtroom in Erie an hour's drive away, making this whole peaceable assembly thing possible down here in the valley (and somewhere along the trail we heard the saga of the weeping young sister busted for heroin disguised in a bottle of Alleve, how a family attorney suggested the cops might want to pick up a sealed bottle of their own from any drugstore, how the head cop broke open a pill with the butt of his flashlight, scattering clouds of white powder everywhere, and how it too tested positive—)

The only snake I saw this Gathering was somebody's pet, peeking anxiously out of her shoulderbag

Every trail here is a spiritual path, a rambling journey from heart to heart, hug to hug: every person we meet is a fresh destination, every passing glance a potential detour through airports and alleyways, digital avatars or ancient incarnations:

 every conversation is an odyssey of chance companions across watersheds and divides, starry dunes or galactic clusters: every fork along our way is a choice between parallel dimensions, clashing mythologies or colliding tectonic plates, every camp or kitchen where we linger a supernova of stories, songs, laments, visions, memories, each left behind in its turn on our daily pilgrimage from daylight to starlight

A long "Om" sounding through the trees from the neighborhood next door

At every stop for rest on our way up the long steep trail, another rustic, peaceful view down through the woods

Looking back into the heart of the Gathering from my mossy stump or fallen log, all I see is trees but the invisible valley below swells and surges like the sea with a jubilant pandemonium, voices, drums, dogs...

With every step the birds grow louder, the noises fade behind us—then suddenly out of nowhere an electric guitar, and a dude strides by hugging a monster boombox, missing everything the birds keep patiently repeating

“I swear that cart has put on about twenty pounds since we started up this hill,” my traveling buddy pants

And all at once without warning we’re in the car, doors slam, engine revs, driving back into the vast, oblivious, infinitely obnoxious boombox of the world

(Yet even there, if we pay attention, under every yard of gravel and asphalt and concrete we can detect a trace of an ancient trail that leads unerringly always to another heart—another hug— another home)

Southern Appalachian Seed Camp Solstice

Pre-Gathering Seed Camp, June 2012
Cherokee National Forest, Tennessee

In the grand old Southern hospitality tradition, the pleasure is all mine—to welcome my planetary human family to the cloud-forests of Katuah, world's largest outdoor sauna, and welcome my redneck neighbors Home.

It's a simple matter of heritage: my redneck forebears took this territory from the Cherokee, who took it before that from the Creeks.
Then the Yankees came and took it again and sold it under the table to the real estate speculators, the corporate investors and the financiers.

But these ancient worn-down mountains are done biding their time.
A tribe of down-home hippies and pierced and dreadlock'd and tattoo'd punks has sprung up out of these hollows like psychedelic toadstools after a rain to answer the call of foggy forest glades, grass-covered balds, rocky streams meandering like a mountain storyteller through rhododendron in bloom...

We have taken our Appalachian highland homeland back again just by calling her true name.

Forgive me, little greenbriar vine, for sawing you off at the root with my hopelessly dull pocketknife, but you've drawn blood already once today, and you know that only brings out the worst in a human. Anyway I know you have strong, deep roots and you'll be back before long — as I will myself, if my own root system goes deep enough and strong enough when my turn comes

Thank you, quiet tent-site, for absorbing all my clumsy human noises into your quietude—my crooked stumbling in circles through brittle leaves and grasping vines that first evening just before dark in search of you and every night since, finding my way back

Gentle rain at twilight in the meadow—
a welcome condensation of the June humidity after dancing in the sweaty rays of a long hot Solstice day, planting the sacred seeds of a Gathering in this steep, moist, breathtaking place in the heat wave's sweltering embrace

One last smoldering coal in the ash of the heart-fire sends up smoke to the spirits of this man-made clearing on the mountain's slope as the shadows creep out from the treeline
 to join us

The firewood we gathered is damp, but a few dry sticks of cedar well placed fire a slow blaze

And when I return long after dark, a heart-shaped pyramid of fire roars in the center of a circle of voices and drums and one vagabond flute

If you're a kid with a toy, certain things become irresistible: like tasing a safely unarmed suspect, or drilling the pristine Arctic for oil, or buzzing the Rainbow camp with one hand trembling on the joystick of your government-issue helicopter ("N.Y.P.D.," this one says, oddly enough, swooping low over the treetops of a National Forest in Tennessee—) And the bigger boys upstairs get the same video-arcade thrill, I'm sure, with a loftier view from their offices in Washington and Manhattan

A tribe of long-legged crickets has taken up residence between my tent and rain-fly for the duration, it seems, along with an assortment of spiders and spider-prey

Thank you, gentle tent-site for cradling my weary spine against your bosom of leaves and moss at the end of each day's endless wandering—trudging dust and gravel and mud and heat, uphill and down, hauling cabbage for Kid Village, plywood for Info, cornmeal for Katuah Kitchen and my own two loads of way too much

Eerie dancing shapes of flame come leaping out between the shadows dancing around the heart-fire's glow

With every fallen limb the fire-tender heaves across the flames, whirling embers chase each other up a chimney of spiraling smoke through the laser patterns of someone's battery-powered hallucination

The drummers are working together, smooth and steady as a river's unstoppable momentum with occasional rushes of turbulence in the flow

The dancers twirl like eddies in the current of rhythm while the singers spin the hoop of each song around and around, tossing it high on their upstretched fingertips

Just when I finally earned my Merit Badge for Decorating the Forest, my expertly strung banners of colorful cloth start vanishing one by one—abducted by a cadre of kids who think the quickest shortcut to adulthood is to upset all the grown-ups and run.

I went through that phase too, I seem to recall, so I know the flag-snatching game will pass and one more generation of rebels will gradually relax into the sacred responsibilities of living—including the task of watching over the next wave of adolescents—until their own turn comes to catch themselves ranting crabbily at kids about flag-thievery or some equally juvenile game ...
(Score one more for rebellious youth!)

But the flag-bandits are not the only children here.
It's ten days before the Gathering, and trading blankets crowded with glittering toys already line the main trail and full-grown men sit idly dangling an empty pipe from a length of string tied to a stick while adults of all ages are hard at work lashing tarps to trees, laying miles of waterline, digging slit latrines in the rocky clay, preparing a place for children to play ...

After all these years, at last I have a new Rainbow name! Just call me “Late for Supper ...”

I'm hungry,

sure, but I've missed more than nourishment.
My hands miss holding other hands on my left and right. My heart misses the singing. My spirit misses the praying. My brain even misses those interminable announcements. Dammit, I missed another circle!

The rain taps a rhythm on my tarp in code: the random spatter and splat of high truths descending on a material plane of bright blue plastic and running off unheeded, only briefly interrupted in their age-old work of re-hydrating the world one tiny glimmering droplet of holy water at a time

Thank you, patient tent-site for enduring my restless human comings and goings, for watching over my increasingly chaotic tentful of jumbled objects, for giving me the peaceful moments I need for all these gathered glimpses, insights, impressions to overflow at last into hasty scribbling like turning inside out my pocketful of random trash at the end of the day

These mountains know we'll be back again a year from now— no more, no less— to put up tarps and build a fire and sing

When Summer comes around once more and the sun climbs to its zenith on the longest day, we'll be here camped on another mountainside to greet another Solstice

These children will always know they belong to a family that holds hands in a circle once a year, honoring the larger circle of Earth and sky and a bigger Family:
their relatives in the forest, in the creek, in the air and in the heart where all our loved ones live forever

In the Sanctuary of Silence

Cherokee National Forest, Tennessee, 2012

1. HOMECOMING

Let the wild rumpus resume!
— back from the city after working a week between two weeklong vacations at the Gathering, my Home away from home, this peaceful village among the trees

A peeping frog speaks up from a puddle at the side of the trail in his inimitable voice, singing the one syllable that is his to sing in the invisible choir of Creation as I too paint my irreplaceable stripe of this infinite human spectrum

(But the cicadas own the night!)

The circle of acquaintances you make dashing in from the downpour, taking shelter beneath the closest kitchen tarp—

Someone has done this work: spreading sticks in the muddy patches on the trail — and someone will break up the dry hard mud with pick and digging bar and scatter new seed when we're done walking here

The circle of newfound friends you make around a brand-new shitter, taking turns with the mattock and the long-handled spade—

A mournful violin quavers sweetly behind my tent this morning, rehearsing “The Star Spangled Banner” for the celebration on the Fourth

The circle of brothers and sisters lost to the tribe since last year’s Gathering, enshrined in a round white pavilion beside the trail filled with photographs and messages of farewell that overflow the heart—

Two heartbeats meet and merge into one for the eternal moment of a hug separated by nothing but the bone and skin and cartilage of a mere human lifetime

Don’t know what you’re high on, but I’m high on this mountain

2. VARIATIONS ON THE THEME OF SILENCE

So quiet
I can hear the cooks whispering over breakfast under kitchen tarps for miles around

So quiet
it spooks the dogs and they can’t shut up

So quiet
I can hear a child somewhere insisting that a dog stop barking

So quiet
I can hear the coughing of campfire-smoke close by and road-dust a mile down the mountain

So quiet
I can hear the tow trucks growling along the road stalking their next victim

So quiet
I can hear the Om of the flies and mosquitos searching for a way into my tent

So quiet
I can hear my heart pumping oxygen to every cell of my inner universe and contaminants from every cell back to the source to be purified by my next breath

So quiet
that the sudden cry of “Six up!” echoes up the main trail like a pistol shot interrupting a Sunday service in the sanctuary of Silence

that the infant wailing in my neighbor’s tent seems to be telling me not to worry about the future of this cantankerous, quarrelsome tribe

3. FAMILY REUNION, FOURTH OF JULY

This is the family:
 good friends from gatherings long gone by suddenly gone grey amid the swarm of unfamiliar faces, all these young ones just as respectful of the heart of Silence

A brother doing slow Tai Chi, a sister spinning her leather baton in the air, dragonfly cavorting over meditating heads as the meadow fills with beatific smiles and multicolored parasols, pale liberated breasts under sunburned faces, ecstatic hugs of “long time no see” in pantomime

One twisting out the kinks in his vertebrae audibly above the Silence, another with a family-size box of chocolates hurrying through the steamy humidity in search of shade, the silent face-painter intent on his craft amid a carnival of tattoos

A long Om, letting it all out . . .
 on and on until it seems to take on a life of its own, a living, chanting creature rippling the sunshine, washing the perimeter of trees with overlapping waves like the breath of the meadow itself . . .
 on and on
 even after the kids’ parade arrives, threading in silence through concentric circles of sound to the very center of the Om—

Then comes the breeze and the cheer followed by the ritual sacrifice of watermelons

4. TRASH IN MY POCKET

Competition for pocket-trash sure is fierce this year . . .

Leaning uphill, bent against the weight, staring down at the gravel roadbed and my plodding boots as I tow my loaded hand-truck step by step up this mountain, I spot every cigarette butt and glittering fragment of wrapper, and my trash-pocket is still only half full

(Standing up to rest, my breath catches—the open, listening woods stretch away on every side . . .)

On the flattened grass, the morning after at Granola Funk Theater: two butts, three wrappers, one dime, one stray envelope addressed “To the Girl I Fell in Love with on the Trail” while the white canvas pyramid shines in the sun like something that landed here when no one was looking, its black-painted stage like an open mouth where I stood last night bellowing out a poem about Silence to an audience of dim listening shapes, the trees crowding thick around the meadow, dark against the darkness, rapt and curious

5. MAMA KATUAH

Somebody up there loves us!
 The downpour interrupts everything,
 Mama Katuah
 refusing to be ignored

 Mama Katuah will rain on us, we know, showering us clean inside though she smears our clothes and shoes with yellow mud

Mama Katuah,
 up to her ancient tricks as usual but I never saw her more beautifully garbed and jeweled, showing it off in every stroke of lightning

Mama Katuah loves a surprise, the gust of wind so strong it toppled a leaning tree across an empty tent even though that particular tree was leaning the other way

I hear Mama Katuah laughing to herself behind the ridge and head back to the tent to doublecheck my tarp, my white socks forever stained with Mama Katuah's love

And finally,
Mama Katuah in person—the fat copperhead waiting at the zipper of my tent when I come home at two a.m., shimmering psychedelic stripes the color and pattern of the leaves under her pale belly oozing through my flashlight beam

6. HOMEGOING

Thank you, ancestors, spirits of this land, protectors of this sacred water, guardians of all the directions we travel, leaving Home

Thank you, brothers and sisters harnessing yourselves to more one load, headed this time down the hill, each re-invention of the wheel more inventive than the one before

Thank you, mothers and fathers of all these children chasing one another across the grass, seedlings of Gatherings to come

*Thank you,
Earth and Sky
Thank you,
All my Relations
Ho!*

Passing the Feather

Harvest Council, Georgia
November 2017

Pass that feather!
I've been sitting here listening, twitching and trembling, lips pressed tight, holding back all the wisdom and enlightenment of a lifetime, waiting while the feather makes its leisurely way the long way around this circle for my turn to speak.

Now

I sit turning it around and around in my fingers, admiring its psychedelic turkey-stripes while I try to recollect everything I had saved up to say.

And now that I've said it, it's time to pass the feather on.

On to other fingers, other voices, other visions, whole new generations that have joined the circle while I sat speaking my mind, younger sisters and brothers not yet even born who will settle into their places as we older ones step back, fall away, and pass into the lore of tribal memory.
The circle is never-ending, ever-changing.
Wisdom and enlightenment grow and evolve.
Generations arrive, speak their minds, pass on. The listening goes on and on. The feather keeps on going around.

Water Is Life (Water Is Alive)

Pre-Gathering Seed Camp, June 2018
Chattahoochee National Forest, Georgia

Water from the sky

Is that rain again?
No, only the wind shaking the trees under bright blue sky.
No, wait— here come the rainclouds from the other direction, delivering our daily shower!
But never mind.
As soon as I step out of my tent, day or night, the wet bushes crowding close on either side of my little trail baptize me again in the name of the Mother.

Water from the mountain

My waterbottle runneth over!
Even water pressure is free here—sweet pure water, gravity-fed, bubbling out of muddy seeps, meandering downslope through half a mile of snaking waterpipe, pushing through state-of-the-art ceramic filters, high above the valleys where mining for gold has poisoned the wells of Dahlonega with arsenic and lead . . .

It was the gold found here that sealed the fate of the Cherokee, stripped them of their farms and stores, their printing press and other earnest trappings of assimilation, gold that drove them from their mountain homeland into exile on the Oklahoma plains.
And gold, as always, that stripped away the mask of peace and lawfulness and civilization from the palefaced invaders.
Now it's petroleum, "natural gas," tar sands that threaten the water of the continent and Native nations standing up once more against the heirs of the invaders.

The crack in my waterbottle . . .
The puddle in my tent . . .
Every time I swallow a mouthful of living water from this openhearted mountain, I grow more thankful for the kindness of the rain.

Hugs and Conversations (Farther Along the Same Path)

Chattahoochee National Forest, Georgia, 2018

Another sticky, steamy day in utopia!
Sitting by the trail all day memorizing 827 names, falling in love with a lovely young sister every six minutes or so, waiting so long in the outer ring at dinner circle that the first course to arrive is dessert—

(like seeing a rainbow before the rain, like calling out “Thank you!” a heartbeat after the voice of the forest whispers, You’re welcome)

◦

Flakes of mica glinting through the grass wherever grass grows

I measure time and distance here by hugs and conversations: It took me six conversations and fourteen hugs to make it to Kiddie Village, how far have you traveled today?

Arriving with my sack of tomatoes safe in plastic clamshells, I made my offering to one of the sisters who feed the children.

She pointed to a stack of identical clamshells lining the side of the supply tent and grinned. I added half a dozen more to my sack and wandered on.

At Instant Soup they were thrilled to see tomatoes but had some bread they couldn’t use because it wasn’t gluten-free so I loaded my empty sack again and wandered on.

◦

Farther along the same path, the people I passed a ways back come strolling by in a gentle mist of rain where I’ve stopped for conversation and shelter.

Next time I see them they’re the ones who’ve paused to socialize beside the path as I pass by—no matter what holy pilgrimage or mission of madness you’re on, whatever you do,
slow down to the pace of the trees, don’t miss the moment you’re passing through

Safe in leaf-duff camouflage, the toad you can only see when it moves or blinks

◦

A new team sport!
Pitching a rock over a lofty limb with a string attached to hoist a banner explaining how to care for the forest—

Give us this day our daily workout!
Hauling a load of groceries in, bags of trash back out—

Rattle of pots and pans at the dish station, chitchat over suds and soot—

A new revolutionary slogan:
Working for free is more fun!

o

At the town meeting, the county sheriff stood up and lied right into his microphone.
Trash left behind in the woods?
These woods are cleaner now than before we came!
Some of the trash we found has lain here so long it's considered an artifact, illegal to toss in the garbage!

Every trail this morning is muddy and pristine.
No accident. For every thoughtless or distracted set of fingers casually letting go of what no longer serves, at least one pair of eyes is watching for the tiniest scrap of microtrash.

Contusions and abrasions, scrapes and booboos, poison ivy and chigger-bites, the occasional copperhead or timber rattler strike—

Feed those medics well, brothers and sisters!
Send a runner with some extra dessert!

Flock of black-winged damselflies trailing long thin bodies of electric blue

o

"We're on the Rainbow Trail right now," says a little guy with loose wild hair walking in front of me on one of the random tracks we've made traveling single file through the high grass across the meadow

A shitter with a view!
The roll of toilet paper that got away, unspooling down the steep shitter trail—

We will be known someday to archeologists of the future as "The People Who All Shit in One Place"

Dance and play while the weather is fine, tomorrow
you'll be digging a shitter in the rain!

A brother in a wheelchair who chose to miss his very first chance to hold hands with his newfound family in a circle on the Fourth so another brother could borrow his wheels to join the circle one last time—

A young dog tethered to a tree beside the trail watching anxiously for one particular face among the passing multitude (Reminds me of the snakebit pup who saved two kids from a copperhead, saved in turn by an herb-wise midwife)

o

Striped curve of fan-shaped fungus like a grey-brown butterfly pausing on a stick beside the trail

Dark-thirty.
Lusty strumming and singing spilling down the hill from Granola Funk—jazzy wordless a cappella riffs with finger-snapping percussion drifting from the Katuah heart-fire—Rice Krispie treats and blueberry cobbler fresh from the oven, a choice of desserts, except here I don't even have to choose—Now you're spoiling me again!

And then the ultimate luxury out here in the woods: fresh, hot, soapy dishwater provided by some loving anonymous soul

Crickets fill the night with rhythm accompanying every act of the Rainbow Variety Show onstage in this moonlit hilltop meadow

Thunder of a military chopper circling in the dark above the thunder of the drums around the heart-fire, interrupting the rhythm and rhyme of Spoken Word Open Mike at We-Home kitchen

Friendly lights passing in the darkness, friendly voices passing without a flashlight, clusters of young folk talking and laughing in the cool of night at every bend of the road—

They're here to lead the way

Better get busy and train your replacement!

There is only one world but two ways of seeing:
 from inside the tent it's all beautiful and amazing, filled with mysterious light.
 Step out into that light and you are the mystery, that beauty and amazement hidden inside you all along.

May your path wind steadily upward, a little less steeply than this trail up to Fat Kids kitchen—

A long streak of foxfire lighting up a phosphorescent stick floating eerily down the dark path in someone's invisible hand

By the last day of the Gathering we've got this down, we could go on forever

Here in our natural habitat, the state of nature, every color, creed, and culture sharing the forest, dining room in the meadow, living room among the trees, at home in sunshine and rain-shower alike—

Now it's time to break camp, disappear these trails, recycle the garbage and go

Vow of Silence

 Chattahoochee National Forest, Georgia, 2018

Take that first step into the Silence, even if only to visit the latrine

You can't quite gauge the depth of the Silence till you hear two voices blithely chatting away, unaware Silent blessings on my neighbor who sneezes, silent giggles at my neighbor who snores—

A solitary drumbeat reverberating between the ridges till it seems to come from every direction at once—

The inevitable dogfight, accompanied by the usual chorus of human barks and howls—

Until you learn to hold the Silence, you can't hear the Silence

Listen! It's right there inside you always

If silence isn't part of your religion, what about respect for the observance of others?

The Circularity Is Coming!

Chattahoochee National Forest, Georgia, 2018

Such a deal!
down at the trade circle, a hug for a hug . . .

I wish I could reach all the way around this meadow and gather everybody here in one gigantic hug!
I wish I could hold every single hand at once!
Luckily, all of my sisters and brothers have arms and hands too, extending my reach all the way around the sun and back—

A hug is the smallest circle, a living fractal of that moment when we all touch and hold for one electric moment the current of love that connects us all, everywhere,
always.

A family is a circular being like a planet.
Most of the time you can't see the whole thing at once.
That's why humans launched themselves into space, to look back over our shoulders and see where we came from.

That's why we instinctively converge in the biggest meadow we can find to hold hands in a circle: because we came from a circle and to a circle we return.

But instinct is evidently not enough.
The concept of a circle is beautiful in theory, powerful in esoteric doctrine, perfect in mathematical precision, but this hungry dinner circle crowd hasn't quite grasped it yet.

Look around:
it's not a circle till you can see every face!

It's not complete until we all link hands!

No trailing ends. No lonely disconnected arcs. No spirals.
Yes, hippies can form a simple geometric configuration
in the meadow!

A single self-bounded energy circuit, grounded in the Georgia clay beneath this meadow grass, and even that leftist conspiracy “thumbs left.”

Yes, it can be done!

(But the servers get the best view after the circle breaks up and the food starts on its way around)

Love circulates through this crowd like blood through a body, like water through its cycle—gas, liquid, solid.
Eyes, voice, heart.
Open your arms, accept this gift, pass it on.

Finally, on the Fourth, it happens.
In the Silence, no one bellowing out guidance or instructions, we line the undulating edge of the meadow, shady side to sunny, our ragged circumference slowly stretching out and stepping back as more hands join until we reach the uneven perimeter of trees, two circles finally touching, holding an identical Silence, suddenly One.

like a rainbow!
It's that rare moment when we can see the whole thing all at once, the way the rainbow only shows itself complete to eyes aloft on wings. Once you've seen it, who could ever forget? Seven colors. Innumerable shades and tints and hues between. One circle circumscribing the visible spectrum, the chromatic splendor of ordinary daylight, the diversity of unity, the family that lives in light.

In Spirit House

Chattahoochee National Forest, Georgia, 2018

Imagine!
Anyone might show up in our circle on the Fourth, anyone at all . . . except the ones enshrined here in Spirit House.

Within these open walls of fallen branches lashed upright in a circle on the grass, in the circular shelter of a parachute, we remember looking back.

We reflect looking ahead.
Our turn will come.
And no one is truly lost as long as someone remembers.
All these missing ones are gathered into our circle after all.

When I die just toss my ashes in the shitter—not all at once, just a scoop at a time to repel the flies and keep the family healthy

(Though I scattered Paisley's in the heart-fire instead, my last stop before heading up the trail and out to the lost, forgetful world)

Grace for Bandits

Chattahoochee National Forest, Georgia, 2018

“Musician, play this moment’s music as grace for those who block our road, grace for bandits!”

Rumi

Free people instinctively know which laws to ignore, which ordinances and regulations are unjust, unnecessary, specifically targeted at freedom.

Law enforcement officers instinctively seem to fear free people.
They might act like adolescent bullies, but only under the color of law, forgetting the rules that don’t quite apply, ignoring the ones that limit their discretion.

Sometimes the only way to declare your independence from the bulldozers and chainsaws is to hike deep into the wilderness that remains.

“Freedom isn’t free,” as the bumper sticker says.
Sometimes the price of freedom is an illegal search without probable cause at an unconstitutional roadblock where immoral statutes of corrupt republics are enforced by lawmen breaking the law in broad daylight.

Sometimes you have to walk six miles carrying all your gear to escape the tyranny of television with its goosestepping ads, the dictatorship of cash registers and credit cards, the despotism of the internal combustion engine.
Freedom is a muscle that grows stronger with exercise, not a virus you can catch from a website about freedom.

Sometimes the only way to proclaim your emancipation from the war against love is to hug every stranger you see.

Freedom doesn’t shelter you from the rain, but the rain scares away the thugs in uniform, and navigating the mud makes you stronger.
Building a fire when the wood is wet makes you smarter—next time you’ll unroll that extra tarp.
And sawing through each dead fallen branch you dragged out of the woods to keep your family warm keeps you not only warm but free.

The Nazis convicted at Nuremberg all pled innocent.
They were only following orders.
The Lumpkin County deputies, Georgia State Patrolmen, and Forest Service LEOs who gathered to harass and intimidate a Gathering of free people on the taxpayers’ dime have at least caught a glimpse of freedom.
They can no longer claim innocence.

Make a Joyful Noise

Chequamegon-Nicolet National Forest, Wisconsin, 2019

Calling in the four directions to consecrate the dawn: birdsong . . . banjo . . . yapping dog . . . voices from the shitter behind my tent—

Carrying poetry deep into the woods, bound into a book, captive in a clear ziploc bag, but still untamed—like a long drink of cool sweet water pumped from the lake, filtered and sealed in stainless steel, but forever wild, replenishing the water table within

Silver crescent low on the horizon, tilted over the dark treeline

Red-gold flame and coals in the heart of the heart-fire

Bagpipes swirling around the drums Euphoric devotees of the moon goddess Euphoria, wildly dancing with living flickerings of flame as the drummers pound out their joyful noise to the fire goddess Joy—

The young dogs
don't know any better.
The young folks tethered to them by leash or rope don't know much more.
But only the untethered, human or canine, walk these trails imagining we wander alone.

“Emancipation from Babylon” means liberation from grocery stores, shovels and saws, cooking pots, flashlights and batteries, fancy tents, sturdy tarps, cars and highways, cell phones and towers, the omnipotent internet itself—

Emancipation of the heart, on the other hand, requires only redemption from that old heartache, the lonely striving to belong to a world crammed with illusions of belonging

First light— some drummers don't know when to quit!
 This one's been waiting patiently all night to take a solo—

Kids shrieking and squealing, chasing each other with water balloons in the hot sun, getting wet, no one getting hurt—(but then afterward, all these colorful fragments of rubber in the grass . . .)

The drumming drops off, pauses but never stops completely, as if it's only me that goes away between gatherings, as if the crowd of voices hollering "We love you!" and the crowd that hollers it back across the meadow at midnight never actually stopped loving me—

Black dirt trail, weaving through a stand of birch Jazz and brunch at Kid Village—in the background, a tent coming down
*In the end we learn if we're lucky the very first lesson:
 just being here together is enough*

Cook-Smoke

 Chequamegon-Nicolet National
 Forest, Wisconsin, 2019

What do you do out there all week in the woods, anyway?

Well, before we pray and after, we take turns feeding each other—prepping veggies, flipping pancakes, tending the oven-fires, serving the crowd at Main Circle, scrubbing pots and utensils—what else are we here for in this bountiful world but to take care of our family?

Rainbow chefs at work under billowing tarps, cook-smoke blown shimmering on the morning breeze through slantwise shafts of sun—

Puppies dragging their leashes, pygmy goat on a rope, banjo hanging by its strap from a forked branch, teenager blowing a ram's horn for the hell of it, getting the hang of it—people scattered on blankets and logs, sleeping, talking, strumming, not waiting, exactly, but ready any minute to line up at the bliss rail again for the next round—
"Free food in the woods!"

Shitter Magic

Chequamegon-Nicolet National

1.

In the last of twilight I tracked down a not only flat but level and miraculously unoccupied patch of grass just big enough to pitch my tent, made camp on the verge of the dark—

Didn't discover till I came home around midnight that I was camped at the edge of that no-man's-land where tie-dyed tourists and water-shamans, pipeline warriors and spare-changers squat as equals over the shitter.

Checking it out next morning I found five slit trenches used up and filled in again, a sixth still in use, brim-full and about to overflow ...
Luckily I didn't need it just yet.

2.

Never too old to dig a shitter in my pajamas!
At least not yet.
Once again, it's my morning meditation
on the Fourth.

The dirt is rich and moist and easy, at least between the roots—but these roots are the toughest I ever tried to chop through with a shovel-blade.

Finally, about three feet down, the first rock:
a water-rounded hunk of glacial till, so hospitably cooperative compared to the roots ...

3.

So much depends on some young brother or sister stepping up to carry it on as we old folks grow older and vanish one by one
into the dark
to nourish the roots of the living ...

Or, in this case, two brothers and a sister who digs like she smells buried gold or chocolate!

A lesson in the seemingly impossible: just begin.
If the goal is worthwhile, someone will show up precisely when you're ready to fling your shovel away cursing the dirt.

4.

The secret of success at the shitter, as in just about everything, is to wait till the moment is ripe.
 Remove pants. Remove skirt.
 Remove underwear.
 Squat in the ancient asana
 of elimination.
 Pay close attention to movement and murmurings within.
 And then, whatever you do, don't miss!

5.

How come only one species has to wipe its behind?
 Agriculture.
 How come only one feeds an arrogant One Percent with delicacies grown by the rest of us?
 Agriculture.

6.

Blister at the base of my thumb scabbed over and almost forgotten till the moment I stand here wondering how the shitter I helped to dig could have moved eighteen inches or so sideways . . .
 Till it dawns on me: that one's long since used up, filled and covered.
 This one right next to it must be the latest model.
 My turn at last.

Under the Tarp

 Chequamegon-Nicolet National
 Forest, Wisconsin, 2019

Have you noticed?
 The weather forecast is 100% accurate 50% of the time.
 The weather itself, on the other hand, is always precisely correct.

Standing here under the tarp looking around at the rainy woods, I am of the world but not in it. Life is good!

Under the tarp at Info,
 at Kid Village,
 at Turtle Soup, casual talk braids the loose threads of random lives into a circle while the rain rants and mutters and finally dies to a whisper, a feral language older than this glacier-sculpted terrain:

Life is never so good that it can't get better.

The Feast of Gratitude

Chequamegon-Nicolet National Forest, Wisconsin, 2019

Are you sure it's not illegal to have this much fun?
Circling for dinner in a sprinkle of rain, waiting for the serving wagons and wheelbarrows loaded with steaming pots of food to make their rounds between our concentric circles on the grass—

Creature with a thousand empty stomachs sprawled here in the meadow, a thousand empty cups and bowls and plates overflowing with the feast of gratitude

All these youthful faces, unknown to me yet so familiar, dreadlocks, navel rings, tattoos catching the wane of daylight like a field of flowers in bloom

Joking and gossiping, finger-picking the theme song of a sitcom canceled long before they were born, trading instruments in mid-jam, standing and joining hands when it's time at last to circle and sing like it's the only reason they came—

Creature with a thousand open mouths singing the divine chord

Om

in a thousand mortal voices from a thousand open hearts

At last it arrives, my three-course, five-star, field-gourmet meal:
I mix together helpings of beets and lentils, then salad and macaroni, finally two kinds of soup with a dinner roll (and on the other side of the circle, something else entirely, no doubt—)

Are you absolutely positive it's not illegal
to have this much fun?

Peace to the World

Chequamagon-Nicolet National Forest, Wisconsin, 2019

Silence in the meadow.
Silence in the woods.
Silent maze of trails.
Silent village of tents.
Silent cooks
in silent kitchens.
Silent people smiling, hugging, praying, meditating . . .
Peace
at last on this embattled Earth?
Why not?

The sleep-in meditation . . .
(Bhakti yoga)
The sun-bath meditation . . .
(Raja yoga)
The cell-phone-trance meditation . . .
(Jnana yoga)
The whispering-first-aid meditation . . .
(Karma yoga)

Yes, we're all here, each observing our own Silence on the Fourth, a fragmented circle groping toward unity as we arrive one by one in the meadow and the sun reaches toward noon—hands stretching out for hands, little by little closing the circuit of living energy, joining our many silences into One—a reverse prism, gathering all the colors in a single beam of clear white light, radiating more than the sum of our hearts, projecting a cosmic ray into space where a bright hot disk burns against the blue—one heart on Earth, one in the sky, each pumping life through a living circle of family.

Gunshots? No, just some adolescent firecracker prank, forgotten a minute later when thunder growls like an angry god beyond the horizon.
Heavy dark clouds crowding in to shade our sunburns, or to douse our campfires? No, just a cooling mist of spray across our steadily expanding circle . . .

Peace to the world
beyond this meadow!
Peace to the Earth
turning under our circle!
Peace to the Mother who gave birth to all these bellybuttons!
(Peace to my own beloved mother who lies peacefully dying eleven hundred miles away on this random day in July.
It's a good day to die.)

And right on cue, the Kids' Parade marches in to pop the Silence like a giant bubble, a new generation of bellybuttons taking its proper place: the center of a mighty circle
sounding the Om.

The Wind Goes Where It Wills for my mother, Carol Ann Wise Wingeier June 21, 1930 - July 4, 2019

Who is that, slipping invisibly away between the leaves?

The wind passes high in the trees, a restless murmur traveling through to parts unknown, and the trees toss their heads—

*Tears have nothing to say about her silence at the end after long life.
Her smile said everything.*

Every so often, stirring nervously, these lower branches catch the rumor of vast, unimaginable distances—

And then her breathing just peacefully stopped when she'd seen or heard from each and every grandchild.

Above the treetops against a clear blue emptiness, the wind passes over unseen.

One Useful Thing

Chequamegon-Nicolet National
Forest, Wisconsin, 2019

No place to plug in my phone out here, so I left it in the car.
At every turn of the trail another place to plug myself in and recharge my heart!

At least one useful thing per day is my pledge:
dumping an overflowing compost bucket into the pit, hanging a few signs along the trail, hauling an armload of timber slabs (formerly G-Funk Theater) to the firewood pile at the heart-fire, unknotting a rope left behind in a tree by my recently decamped neighbor, helping a sister haul her gear out to the road—

A dedicated core and a willing multitude can do anything, it seems.
When will the world finally catch on?

Among the Creatures

Chequamegon-Nicolet National

1.

Tent unzipped,
I sit daring the mosquitos just to be part of a world undivided by netting as long as I can stand it—

Swarming dragonflies patrol the meadow to feed on the mosquitos we've been feeding

Sun streams down over the ridge of deep green shadow, lighting up the translucent green of this leafy valley where the grass and ferns on the flattened tent-sites of my departed neighbors are slowly straightening up to salute the day

A tiny maple tree with just two leaves holds its ground among the towering ferns

2.

Through my tent-netting one morning I counted six baby slugs making themselves at home under my rain-fly—

On my last morning, flipping the tent over on its head to let it dry underneath—at least two dozen more, all sizes, only one squashed and dried. I deposit each on its own leaf.

Unclipping the tent from its poles—through the netting a trapped moth fluttering in the folds. I crawl back inside, try to herd it toward the door—Suddenly it lands on my thumb, stays there just long enough for a glimpse of its blue-brown glory before I make it to the door and it flies free—

*Every creature of the creation has its purpose for being here, it seems . . .
Only one even has to ask the question*

3.

Back at the trailhead, loading the car to go—two unbathed hippies in unwashed clothes sort through the dripping, stinking bags of garbage piled here by the road . . .
 “Hey brother, can you take home a couple bags of recycling?” I can. I will. And like all the best hugs, it’s impossible to tell exactly who hugged who first.

Correction: only one creature has the option of listening to all the other creatures of the creation for clues

Fifty Years On Down That Same Dirt Road . . .

50th Anniversary Rainbow Family Gathering
 Routt National Forest, Colorado, 2022

Plunging into a field of yellow flowers blooming knee-high to the horizon, where the green jutting pyramid of a mountain rears up to anchor the dangling Earth to the Colorado sky, we finally ease to a stop and turn off the car.
 Deep beneath our tires, a seed
 cracks open in the dark.

The trail is a twin black ribbon of mud between dripping trees and more crowds of yellow flowers, as if they’ve congregated here for a better view of the parade. Puddles lurk in the low spots, reflecting the twilight, indistinguishable from the mud until I take that fatal step.
 (Is that rustling I hear the titter of a thousand flowers?)

Everyone we meet is happy to see me though nobody knows me, even the ones I swear I recognize from other trails, other magical passages into enchanted twilight.
 Between calls of “Welcome Home!” “Howdy folks!” “Hey-ho!” and “How’s it going?”
 a pale root-tip of Silence pushes out through the crack.

High above my tent, the aspen leaves ripple in the wind, sending down little aftershowers on my rain-fly like flurries of percussion from God's timbales . . .

People lived here in this forest of aspen in this high mountain valley for thousands of years, give or take a millennium.

To wake up here this morning, all I had to do was to leave certain things behind, starting with anything too heavy to carry.

Like those ancient people, we congregate here to learn how to live like the aspen—the second-largest living creature on Earth—connected underground, out of sight,
into a single organism.

Underneath our banter and bickering, our drumming, our dramas, our reunions and reminiscences and delirious declarations of love across the valley,
a Silence is sprouting deep in the soil toward the unseen light of day.

*Waking to the sounds of Kid Village—“We need potato choppers!”
“Firewood please! Firewood for Kid Village!” “How can I help?”
“Love you, family!”
— the hundreds of voices blend like merging rivulets into one rushing stream*

If this Gathering is an organism, Kid Village is its heart.
All these corpuscles coursing along the trails, circulating from camp to camp were children once.
Somewhere under the earth, out of sight,
we remember.

These children thoughtfully squishing the mud between bare toes while grownup boots tramp by on the muddy path—

who have not yet realized what kind of world they will inherit, this sacred bequest we have fouled and squandered and desecrated in the act of passing it on like our own forebears before us—

These children
 squealing on a swingset of lashed logs, testing the limits of centrifugal force—bouncing on the seesaw, discovering the joy of balancing one another— that one with blue-painted legs, this one roasting a dead earthworm on a stick—

The lost kid delivered to Info by three kind strangers, who gravely accepts a sticker and a lollipop, and waits till his frantic mom arrives to burst into tears (and the next day, grinning, performs his crazy dance for us at the Kids' Talent Show—)

These children
 don't know yet how much depends on them as they grow up, carrying the seeds of Kid Village like a field of bright yellow flowers somewhere inside—

Dormant memories of this startling glimpse of grownups actually sharing, helping, cooperating, like they're always nagging their kids to do, as all humans everywhere must learn to do if our species expects to survive—

(Relax, kids, no pressure!
 No obligation! Just reach back for those memories, ditch the fallacies and flakiness and press on with whatever works . . .)

Testing the General Theory of Relativity, I experiment with a look, a smile, a word for each and every relative I meet along the trail

Then

a little girl trots by beaming out the ultimate irrefutable proof

Holding hands in a circle is more than just sacred geometry: it's the oldest of human technologies, linking us like the networks of mycelia that transmit the intelligence of life across the planet.

Not just through physical touch, palm to palm, thumbs left as the energy flows, but joined in a living circuit on every level— mental, emotional, spiritual, and unknown dimensions beyond.

We are already One.
 Holding hands only reminds us that applies all the way down to the ground.

And the shoot of Silence breaks through into the light.

*“Circle the wagons,” it turns out, was not a defensive strategy against Indian attacks.
The pioneers only did it for company: to share an evening campfire, cook supper, eat and socialize.
The Native people of the prairies, it turns out, only stopped by to visit and do a little trading.*

These young people skipping or slogging or drifting along the trails, smiling cheerfully through the rain, shining through tattoos and mud-stained clothes, where did they all come from?

They seemed to materialize from the Akashic ether, already knowing everything it took us decades to discover—alert and aware, ready to lean in and do their share (even a little of mine, if I fall short)

Look, there's one with two hens tethered by cotton string and a shaggy black dog, looking bored, all tied to the same tree—

Their smiles and greetings seem to amplify each other exponentially, like lightning electrifying the raindrops into a throng of sentient sparks endlessly reflecting each other—

Another walking a dainty potbellied piglet on a leash, who refuses to step into a mudpuddle but dips its snout for a drink—

Their parade of faces, no two alike, framed in every imaginable style of clothing and hair, every shade of skin, refracts a rainbow arching invisibly upward into the sun—

Now one with an orange cat slung in a baby-carrier on his back, another with a grey songbird glancing around from his shoulder, amazed at this 50th Anniversary Gathering of the Species

Their voices call out in cheerful slang and profanity, trading songs across the fire, echoing between the mountains like that comfortable quiet that only falls between old friends . . . and the sprout of Silence unfurls leaves, greedily gathering sunlight.

*People from everywhere I would never meet anywhere else, a tide of strangers blinding me with solar-powered high-wattage grins— then, every so often,
the sudden hallucinatory flash of someone I actually know and the muscles in my face stretch a little farther yet*

These elder brothers and sisters topped with snow like a Colorado peak hold no authority by virtue of years, only respect for the way each has put those years to use, summer after summer,
and for still,
despite the years, showing up for one more—

Even if they can no longer hike the long trail up the mountain, camping together down on the road, even if they quarrel and kvetch and complain, it was their vision, their sacrifice that made this breathtaking impossibility between two mountains as real as the mountains themselves fifty years on down that same dirt road.

They have given everything to this.
Their strength and intelligence, hearts and hands, even their heroic misjudgements and arrogant missteps, each hard lesson an evolutionary leap enshrined in tradition.
Repeat at your own risk!

Because in the end, growing old is the best-case scenario, isn't it?

And the ones we have lost gather with us still, join our circles, stand firm among us on the solid earth of one undeniable fact:
we still gather.
They're still here in these fuzzy, faded snapshots tacked up in Spirit House, in these two urns of ashes we circle to honor and inter in the trampled grass of Main Meadow, most of all in the tales of tribal legend that pass from voice to voice, generation to generation like a feather traveling hand to hand.
And once more their voices rise clear and strong as the Silence begins to break at last into bud.

Because this grief we feel is just the afterlife of love, proof of eternity, isn't it?

“Hey, long time no see, are you hugging?”

What a blessing to lean on one another for a spell, holding each other up, a brief or extended reprieve from the gravity of living, not to mention the raging pandemic of fear in this time of viral separation—

“May I breathe over your shoulder for a moment, please?”

(And at Everybody's Medical, to my relief, this time negativity does pull me through)

Every smile, every greeting, every hug adds one more golden stitch to the tapestry of light—the luminous embroidery of this Gathering—of this world— of my life wandering the trails of Planet Earth

Under the ghostly rainbow of the Milky Way scattered specks of light slowly wind across the dark meadow, tracing the random twists of midnight trails

At the heart-fire, the pounding drums send ripples of rhythm to the farthest shores of the ocean of stars while the dancers surf those waves of sound and even the bonfire shimmies and sways, waving its arms in the air

In the distance, meanwhile, silent flashes of lightning outline the niche between two dark mountains . . .

Next morning the thunder finally comes, a single startling crack reverberating peak to peak across the Silence of a cloudless sky like the echo of a single slap on the Goddess's djembe

*Is She yelling at us, or was that only laughter?
The breaking day answers with a thousand sunlit smiles*

Exactly half a century since the fireworks first fell silent
on the Fourth of July,
I wake up surrounded by the sound-burst of Kid Village, and set out in search of Silence.

Wouldn't you know it, the most silent camp is the Library!
(where later today I'll witness a brother expertly extracting
"The Star-Spangled Banner" from a banjo with a fiddle-bow.)

"Dog out!" crashes through the Silence like a curse or a prayer to the goddess of kitchen hygiene.

The noisy ones don't count.
No oblivious voice can penetrate this quiet.
No desperate need to interrupt the grownups can disrupt a focused intent to hold Silence.
A spontaneous burst of laughter can only feed the joy.

We who walk in Silence know how to talk in Silence.
Communication gives way to communion, entire languages condensed to a glint in the eyes, a signal flickering heart to heart.
And the buds of Silence split open and burst in a thousand blossoming hearts.

As the Sun's clear light contains all the colors, the pure music of Silence combines every voice that could sing but holds back, every song that patiently waits to be sung . . .

Assembling out of the human world to spread out in concentric circles across the meadow, the Family arrives for its annual blooming.
Crowding in one by one, a vast bouquet of multicolored scented petals: some in fur and buckskin, some only dressed in a suntan . . .
One sitting with eyes closed, back straight, palms up, one twirling a hoop around her hips . . .
One stepping eagerly across thistles and sage into a long silent hug . . .
A barefoot dancer channeling the secret music of acres of skunk cabbage . . .
A child missing a tooth, carrying a sign saying "Love one another" in silence through the crowd, the grownups around him who can't help whispering . . .
A beautiful naked sister offering sunscreen, squeezing into my palm no more than my share, her smile an overflowing basket of sunshine—

(Those who shout from the other end of the meadow craving someone's outraged attention, as if Silence were merely the absence of sound, love no more than abstaining from hate, they only donate their grief and pain to be absorbed and dissolved in the healing balm of Silence.)

*We gather here representing the Whole of Humanity.
So many faces from back home belong here!
So many who may never make it out of the city but hold this circle sacred in their hearts . . .
So many more who never even imagined it!
And so it is. The instant they light up smiling in my mind, they're here, too.
Welcome Home, family!*

The Om arises and sweeps across our circle like an enormous swarm of bees erupting out of Silence, up from the grassy Earth, taking flight in every direction to pollinate the planet with jubilant voices lifted to the sky: a single shimmering moment that lasts an hour, afloat on eternity as we take turns breathing in and singing out the harmony we offer to the world and simultaneously seek within ourselves—

And deep inside us as we hike back out to the road and the world, the Silence we came here to free from its seed begins to bulge and swell and grow plump, sweet and juicy, and the next generation of seeds begins to form . . .

. . . And the Rest Is Mystery

Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, 2025

1.

Deep in the jungles of Missouri at the junction of two long muddy trails, in a grove of old-growth pawpaw trees under a wild crescent moon, the four directions all arrived at once by the most far-fetched coincidence from their infinitely far-flung points of the compass, and met precisely here, delighted as always with yet another impromptu reunion—

And precisely here, where that improbable X marked the spot, drawn by an equally serendipitous synchronicity and an irresistible tingling of the navel, a tribe of nomads and pilgrims and rebels and aging flower children on vacation began to congregate one by one from their own disparate and diverse quadrants and dimensions of space and time to play another round of that age-old game, “Relativity” . . .

*Hey kids, I've got an idea!
Let's get all the amazing people we know together in one place, and all the amazing people they know, and see what happens!*

So much beauty,
 every possible kind!
 Young women and men, all smooth muscle and extravagantly ornamented skin, looking out through the eyes of the ages—Children shining with pleasure through their facepaint—Elder couples out for an evening stroll among the brambles and briars, arm in arm—

A Chinese couple chatting away in Mandarin, matching metal cups dangling at their belts—

Dancing boy, a twin-flame twirler in a cowboy hat—

HomeShalom family singing their daily prayers, Jesus Camp offering baptisms down at the river—

Meanwhile, Main Trail Medical needs footwashing tubs for all the bare feet bruised by these rocky trails, lacerated by these thorny paths—

Every year it's a different Family that gathers, depending who shows up Every year more young folks arrive for their first Gathering Every year fewer silver-haired old-timers make it to their last

3.

This gathering is a journey down the long smooth ribbons of dried mud, through occasional swamps of desperate footprints, where a black hole lurking in the wetness tried to swallow one unwary traveler after another . . .

Deep-fried donut holes served fresh along the trail—

Two big German Shepherds, with a definite dash of husky, harnessed side by side, with goofy grins across their snouts, pulling a wagon down the trail—

“Ant Crossing!” marked with a tiny sign, staked out between towering barricades of twigs across the trail—

We travel together to our separate destinations up and down the trail, laughing as we go—Or we travel alone, but pause to trade life stories with every traveler we pass along the way—each one exactly the person we needed to meet, every conversation exactly the one we needed to have . . .

That's how we know it's not just a festival, a get-together, a meet-up, a convention, a conference, a crowd . . .
 Yes! It's a Gathering!

*That quiz-show game of remembering everybody's name—Yes, there will be a quiz when the roll is called up yonder!
(Hey, nice to see you lending your beauty to the day, smiling sister whose name I instantly forgot . . .)*

4.

Whose brainstorm was it anyway, whose brilliant flash of lightning in the dark to weed-whack through that thick and thorny undergrowth between the trees down by the riverbank to carve out a fine Main Circle in the shade?

As the circle gathers for dinner, one young brother has mastered the backflip, or else was just spontaneously overcome with the urge—

Wait, this tick traveling up my right arm, did it crawl from the hand I'm holding onto mine?
Is our dinner-circle Om so transcendent that even the bugs are inspired to embark on a holy pilgrimage around the circle?

Then the after-dinner singalong as twilight fades and the quarter moon lingers in the sunset—

The First Nations who did not invite us here but graciously welcomed us anyway would never have allowed this jungle to grow chest-high, choking the open woods.
And they wouldn't have needed a weedeater, electric or otherwise.
From coast to coast, the natives of Turtle Island knew how to shape the world they wanted with the tools of fire and tradition.

the chiggers hollered to the ticks . . .
But the smart set never forgets the ritual tick-check between friends or even better, lovers every night . . .*

5.

Want to be part of something awesome?
Try silence!
Whatever you contend, whatever I retort, it's only one person's opinion.
But join this abstinence from sound of every voice for miles around, now that's one powerful consensus! Unity that sounds and resounds, vibrates and reverberates, louder than any bickering, brawling controversy or debate—

That first Om, just before the Kids' Parade reached the circle, that was breathtaking.
 But somehow the Om after the Om draws a deeper breath out of me, deeper than my diaphragm, deeper than the taproots of feeling or thought, deeper than the boundaries of empires, deeper than the fire at the center of the Earth that melts all depth and distance into One . . .
 now those are some mighty powerful little kids.

They can count our license plates but not our webbed and interlacing friendships They can limit our numbers but not our ever-expanding example Year by year the word gets out: there is another way to live

6.

Walking the long trail to the car and the gravel road back to Babylon, my home away from Home, I've learned:
 never look back.
 Wherever I go from here, it's a Gathering.
 Whoever I meet is Family.
 The game of Relativity goes on echoing into infinity.
 And the rest is Mystery.

Choose Your Note

Draw a breath.
 Breathe in long and slow and deep.
 Fill your lungs,
 your heart, your mind, your limbs
 all the way to your toes and fingertips.
 Breathe in the entire sky, all the air and light you can hold.
 Breathe in the peace of the forest, the love of this lush sunny meadow, the green giving life of the Earth.
 Breathe in the serene and somber and smiling faces in the circle, the warm embrace of hands on your left and right.
 Breathe in the silence that held you breathless all morning.
 Breathe it all in, hold the spinning universe absolutely still for one unbroken moment deep in your center.
 Now
 choose your note
 on the human scale, claim your place in the spectrum of voices, breathe it all back out again and join the rising, falling, rolling chorus of the Om.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Stephen Wing has been traveling to Rainbow Gatherings for over four decades. Known as “Wing” at the Gatherings, he spent his twenties on the road, attending the Annual Gathering every July and numerous regionals throughout the South and Midwest. He helped to start Rainbow circles in three cities, worked on the 1988 and 1989 issues of All Ways Free (an annual newspaper for and about the Gatherings), took a turn publishing a Southeastern family newsletter, and published several articles about Rainbow in national magazines.

In 1990 he met his wife Dawn at a Southern Appalachian regional gathering and settled in Atlanta, his biggest gathering yet, where he continues to go by his Rainbow name. They married at the same gathering the following year. Wing still gathers with the regional Katuah Tribe every Summer Solstice and attends the July 4th Annual when he can.

Now retired, Wing has worked as an editor and coordinated the recycling at two different businesses, including the South’s oldest and largest food co-op. Once each season he hosts his “Earth Poetry” workshop at a different urban greenspace. He serves on the boards of the Lake Claire Community Land Trust and Nuclear Watch South.

He is the author of four other books of poetry: Four-Wheeler & Two-Legged (1992); Crossing the Expressway (2001, chronicling his hitchhiking years); Wild Atlanta (2023, poems about Atlanta’s urban greenspaces); and Washed in the Hurricane (2024, poems about wilderness, wild nature in the city, and climate change), along with over a dozen chapbooks, including the “Earth Poetry” series. He is the creator of a line of original bumper stickers, Gaia-Love Graffiti, and has published numerous essays on ecology and evolution in local Atlanta publications. A collection of his Gathering-related prose is in the works. A sampling of published work and recordings can be found at www.StephenWing.com.

ABOUT THE TYPEFACE

Prospera, the font used for the poetry in this book, is a digital typeface created by my good friend and Rainbow brother Petros (Peter Fraterdeus, www.fraterdeus.com) with the assistance of a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. Its first appearance in a printed book was my debut collection, Four-Wheeler & Two-Legged: Poems. Sadly, we lost Petros in the fall of 2020 to an inoperable brain tumor.
